THE FOUNDATION CENTER

The Foundation Center

Mission

The Foundation Center's mission is to strengthen the nonprofit sector by advancing knowledge about U.S. philanthropy.

To achieve our mission, we:

- Collect, organize, and communicate information on U.S. philanthropy;
- Conduct and facilitate research on trends in the field;
- Provide education and training on the grantseeking process;
- Ensure public access to information and services through our Web site, print and electronic publications, five library/learning centers, and a national network of Cooperating Collections.

Founded in 1956, the Center is the nation's leading authority on philanthropy and is dedicated to serving grantseekers, grantmakers, researchers, policymakers, the media, and the general public.

The Foundation Center has documented private philanthropy's response to the September 11 terrorist attacks. Using our experience in collecting and analyzing giving data, we constructed a comprehensive picture of giving by foundations and corporations in the aftermath of 9/11, as well as tracked contributions by intermediaries and direct-service providers. We presented news and in-depth interviews concerning the philanthropic response to 9/11 in the Foundation Center's online journal, Philanthropy News Digest. All of these have been reproduced in September 11: Perspectives from the Field of Philanthropy, vols. I and II. To learn more, please visit our Web site at www.fdncenter.org.

We are grateful to the following for their support of our Philanthropy's Response to 9/11 Project: the California Endowment, Carnegie Corporation of New York, Annie E. Casey Foundation, ChevronTexaco, Citigroup Foundation, Ford Foundation, John S. and James L. Knight Foundation, Lumina Foundation for Education, Morgan Stanley, Charles Stewart Mott Foundation, New York Community Trust, and Rockefeller Brothers Fund. Preface

The Foundation Center's multi-year project Philanthropy's Response to 9/11: Creating the Record and Telling the Story brings into focus the role private philanthropy played in relief, recovery, and rebuilding in the aftermath of September 11, 2001. While we as a people and as individuals continue to live with the consequences of September 11, publication of this compendium volume brings the Foundation Center's specific effort to a close.

It has been a long, often painful passage from September 11, 2001, to this point more than three years later. The tragedies for many and the stresses on everyone have been detailed elsewhere, but impressions created by media ephemera cannot serve as a comprehensive record. For that, the facts about private philanthropy's relief effort needed to be compiled and recorded.

It has been amply documented, by the Foundation Center and others, that private philanthropy played a critical role in filling a variety of needs created by the events of September 11, 2001. In the immediate aftermath of the attacks, private funds were quickly made available by foundations, corporations, and individuals and distributed to a wide range of community organizations that understood how to best reach and serve various affected populations. This was accomplished even as it was becoming clear that the experience and planning of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) provided little direction for the near-term response to the unprecedented circumstances.

In addition, private philanthropy's ability to take a longer view of social problems helped identify the full range of needs to be met. In spite of this, and the effort made by many charities to safeguard sufficient funds for ongoing needs, the pressure to distribute funds rapidly, particularly to victims' families, was intense. Having been stung by the criticism that relief funds had not been distributed quickly enough, these same charities would regard the September 9, 2004, New York Times story entitled "With Funds Winding Down, Questions Remain About Longer-Term Needs" with considerable irony.

The commentary by Lester Salamon that introduces this volume presents perhaps the longest view. Salamon suggests that alleviating the social conditions that give rise to murderous terrorism is one of the proper — and historical — roles of philanthropies such as the Ford and Rockefeller foundations. He goes on to describe the growth of international civil society that is being advanced by the development of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) around the world, and warns that post-9/11 security concerns and policies may have a dampening effect on these activities.

We also present in this volume an edited compilation of Tom Seessel's reports prepared for the Ford Foundation. Seessel presents a thorough account of 9/11 relief and recovery activities — not only the important work of private philanthropy, but also the complex array of government programs through which federal aid was and continues to be distributed. A key point about FEMA's difficulty with individual-assistance programs is made as Seessel quotes one agency official: "FEMA's big role is to help governments, not people, recover."

We have also included a timeline of the events of September 11 and their aftermath outlining the responses of philanthropy, government, and the media to the unfolding drama. This provides context for the other commentaries and reports in this volume and conveys the rush of events and the emotional environment within which 9/11 recovery took place, a major factor determining its course.

To create the record of the 9/11 philanthropic response from September 2001 onward, the Foundation Center tracked the flow of contributions made by institutional funders and the distribution of gifts from all private sources by relief funds. Through a series of research reports we analyzed 9/11 giving patterns and placed 9/11 funding in the context of U.S. philanthropy. We issued a comprehensive report on the activities of the relief funds, 9/11 Relief and Regranting Funds: A Summary on Funds Raised and Assistance Provided, in 2003. Giving in the Aftermath of September 11: Final Update on the Foundation and Corporate Response, included here, is the final research report on 9/11 giving by institutional donors, based on data compiled through September 2004.

The Foundation Center told the story of 9/11 by publishing interviews, articles, and commentary by leaders in the field of philanthropy. These originally appeared in our online journal, Philanthropy News Digest (PND). That work resulted in the publication of two volumes of September 11: Perspectives from the Field of Philanthropy, one issued in September 2002 and the second in September 2003. We include here a complete list of these enlightening interviews with people involved in 9/11 relief and recovery. Those two publications were designed to accompany this volume.

To assist those seeking additional resources about 9/11 relief and recovery, we have included a bibliography of 9/11 resources available in Foundation Center library collections, as well as a comprehensive directory of relief and recovery grants made by foundations and corporations through September 2004.

We are grateful to the following foundations for making this project possible: California Endowment, Carnegie Corporation of New York, Annie E. Casey Foundation, ChevronTexaco, Citigroup Foundation, Ford Foundation, John S. & James L. Knight Foundation, Lumina Foundation for Education, Morgan Stanley, Charles Stewart Mott Foundation, New York Community Trust, and Rockefeller Brothers Fund. The ideas expressed in this work are the authors' and do not necessarily reflect those of the funding organizations.

Introduction

The Real Lessons of September 11 for American Charities

Much has been made of the response of American charity to the events of September 11, and for good reason. The misguided terrorists who crashed civilian airliners into unarmed buildings on that fine September morning did not, it turns out, assault a nation lacking the capacity to respond. But that capacity extended well beyond the conventional instrumentalities of federal, state, and local government that have attracted so much attention in the press. In small towns and large cities, from Bangor to Burbank and Sarasota to Seattle, Americans rushed forward to help. In part, the responses were spontaneous and unstructured. But in even larger part, they were orchestrated and guided through the largely invisible social infrastructure that comprises the nation's private, nonprofit sector.

Like the arteries of a living organism, nonprofit organizations carry a life-force that has long been a celebrated part of the American character: a commitment to individual initiative in the public good. What 9/11 demonstrated convincingly, among other things, is that this commitment is still very much alive and well. With relatively little prompting, Americans responded to the events of 9/11 with an outpouring of charitable support. At last count, voluntary contributions to 9/11 relief and recovery totaled a whopping $2.8 billion — $1.1 billion of it from institutional donors like corporations and foundations and the balance from private individuals.¹

In the early aftermath of 9/11, commentary within the nonprofit world understandably alternated between celebrating this charitable response and worrying about its potential negative impact on the revenues of other charitable institutions. Now that some time has passed, however, it is time for American charities to consider the deeper implications that September 11 holds for America's nonprofit organizations and the philanthropic institutions that help support them, for those implications are enormous. Three such implications in particular seem especially important to recognize, and act on.

THE PERILS OF GO-IT-ALONE PHILANTHROPY

In the first place, the 9/11 experience holds important lessons for the operation of charitable organizations. In particular, it points out the perils of “go-it-alone philanthropy,” the view that philanthropy and the state should operate independently of each other, that philanthropy is a substitute for state action, and that collaborations between charity and government are fraught with peril for charitable institutions.

This view gained considerable currency in the early celebrations of charity's response to 9/11. This response demonstrated the value that a robust charitable sector can add to a society's handling of social crises, even one as devastating as 9/11. Charitable resources began flowing quickly, in many cases more quickly than government's. Charities were also more flexible, providing aid to far more than the direct victims of 9/11 and dispensing with many of the need-based restrictions that tied government support in knots for months. The charitable response also carried psychological advantages, signaling the nation's collective sense of grief and transmitting this to the direct victims of the disaster in a way that must have brought emotional as well as financial comfort. No one can claim, therefore, that the response of American charity was in any sense superfluous to the 9/11 recovery.

Yet neither can we claim that it was adequate to the task. To the contrary, what began as an inspiring demonstration of the capacity of old-fashioned American voluntarism to cope with a major social cataclysm quickly became a demonstration of its inherent limitations as well.

One of these limitations is essentially structural in character. The very pluralism and diversity that gave the charitable response its flexibility and innovativeness also significantly limited its coherence and coordination. Despite some notable collaborative ventures, such as the September 11th Fund formed within hours of the tragedy by the New York Community Trust and the United Way of New York City and the United Services Group formed some months later, the charitable response was splintered and diffuse. At least 369 separate organizations entered the 9/11 relief field.² While the preponderance of these were new funds created by existing organizations as opposed to wholly new organizations, the sheer number made the task of coordination difficult, especially given the long-standing nonprofit penchant for autonomy. Families in need therefore had to navigate a maze of organizations, each with its own eligibility criteria and specific forms of aid. Inevitably, delays and inequities occurred: many people fell through the slats, while others benefited from multiple sources of support. What is more, misunderstandings arose between donors and nonprofit groups over how contributions were to be used, and these misunderstandings tarnished the reputation of the philanthropic effort in ways that are still being felt.

Beyond its structure, the charitable response to 9/11 also suffered from limits of scale. At the end of the day, American charity, for all its effort, was able to supply only 10 percent of the resources ultimately made available to cope with the 9/11 disaster. The remaining 90 percent — approximately $27 billion out of the $29.8 billion total — came from government.³ Charitable resources comprised a slightly larger share of the victim compensation aid, but even here it constituted only $800 million out of the $5.8 billion ultimately made available.⁴ Philanthropy did carve out some unique niches not addressed by government support, such as ensuring the continued viability of New York’s important nonprofit arts institutions as well as of hundreds of other nonprofit organizations in the disaster area. Still, the scale of the response was dwarfed by the enormity of the need.

In this, however, the response to 9/11 is emblematic of a broader challenge to American charities, and to their governmental partners as well. Increasingly, the scale of our public problems calls out not for a government or a charitable response, but for a response that marries the advantages of both and engages the business sector as well. Regrettably, however, despite extensive interaction between government and nonprofit groups, our systems for achieving such effective partnerships remain under-developed at best. This certainly was the case in the 9/11 response, which suffered from the start from inadequate coordination between public and private authorities, and among private ones themselves.⁵

Increasingly, the scale of our public problems calls out not for a government or a charitable response, but for a response that marries the advantages of both and engages the business sector as well.

If one lesson of September 11 for America's charities is the limitation of "go-it-alone philanthropy," a second is the need to re-energize the social-justice mission of the charitable world.

Revealingly, the charitable community's own comprehensive assessment of private institutional giving in response to 9/11 barely mentions this challenge of public-private collaboration in the 9/11 relief effort.⁶ Indeed, aside from a footnote reference to the Voluntary Organizations Active in Disaster (VOAD) network organized by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, this assessment barely acknowledges that the public sector was involved in 9/11 relief. Yet such coordination is imperative. While neither sector can afford to wait for the other to move on important issues, neither can they make effective headway operating in splendid isolation. Building effective collaborations, and perfecting the habit, and the skills, of partnering are the keys to gaining real traction on the kinds of problems that now confront us, and this is one of the central lessons we should take away from 9/11.

CHARITY'S SOCIAL JUSTICE MISSION

If one lesson of September 11 for America's charities is the limitation of "go-it-alone philanthropy," a second is the need to re-energize the social-justice mission of the charitable world. "Terror," Martin Luther King once reminded us, "is the last expression of the voice unheard." Terror is fueled, more than anything else, by humiliation, by a sense of powerlessness in the face of unacceptable conditions.⁷ The best way to respond to terrorism is thus to relieve the humiliation that lies at its core and to project hope to terrorism's would-be recruits. This suggests that the war on terror is not just a military conflict, but at least equally a battle of ideas and ideals.

In this battle of ideas, however, the ideal of freedom, which has recently been advanced by our government as its justification for military action in Iraq, may ultimately not suffice. Given the gross disparities in resources and life-chances that exist in much of the world, freedom can have a hollow ring for those on the bottom, suggesting more a license to exploit on the part of the powerful than real opportunity for the millions without. The commitment to freedom must therefore be joined with an equal commitment to social justice, to helping those left behind. This was the message that President Franklin Roosevelt conveyed in his "Second Bill of Rights" towards the end of World War II, as legal scholar Cass Sunstein has recently reminded us.⁸ "Essential to peace," Mr. Roosevelt observed, is not just the cessation of hostilities, but "a decent standard of living for all individual men and women and children in all nations." A similar insight, it would seem, applies to our effort to secure the peace in a world threatened with terror.

To date, however, the American response to terror has taken a different course. Instead of promoting social justice and responding to the voice unheard, our government has emphasized the hard power of military action over the "soft power" of American ideals. In the process, it has surrendered the moral high ground that may ultimately be the best defense against terror.

I saw a powerful demonstration of this in March of 2003, when I found myself in Morocco as American warplanes began their assault on Iraq. To my amazement, the hotel in which I was staying suddenly began to fill up with dozens of American young people on their way home. But these were not casual vacationers. Rather, they were America's front-line soldiers in the battle of ideals: our Peace Corps volunteers, who were being pulled out of the Arab world as our troops went in. We thus replaced the idealism of American youth with the might of the American military as our face to the Arab world's disadvantaged millions, reinforcing rather than relieving the sense of humiliation they must feel. And this was just one facet of a broader retreat from the promotion of social justice that has recently characterized American policy, as the September 11 Commission and other critics have recently observed.⁹

What has all of this to do with American charities? I believe a great deal. The nonprofit sector and philanthropy are America's institutional embodiment of the ideal of social justice. To be sure, the sector has not always lived up to this ideal, nor does it have a monopoly on it. Yet, uniquely among our social institutions it can lay claim to a historic commitment to this ideal both in its rhetoric and its action. This is, after all, the sector that has nurtured the succession of social movements that have extended human rights and broadened the American commitment to social justice over two centuries, beginning with the anti-slavery movement in the nineteenth century through the women's suffrage movement in the early twentieth century to the succession of civil rights, women's rights, gay rights, environmental, consumer, pro-life, pro-choice, and conservative movements of recent years.

Regrettably, however, the social-justice voice of the charitable world has in some respects grown more faint in recent years. Thus, while charitable giving has grown substantially over the past 30 years, the share of that giving flowing to human services has actually declined, from 12 or 13 percent in the early 1970s to less than 9 percent in the 1990s, and less than 8 percent today.¹⁰ Internationally, the record is even more bleak. Official U.S. international aid as a share of gross domestic product has long lagged far behind that of other advanced countries while the share of private giving that goes for international relief and development as well as for all other international purposes, despite absolute growth, remains stubbornly below 2 percent of all giving. In fact, international aid organizations report a drying up of donations for overseas relief despite an escalation of international relief crises.

In the wake of September 11 and in the face of a quite different governmental response, I believe American charities should make a concerted effort to renew charity's social justice mission, both at home and abroad. Such a recommitment does not in any sense condone or justify the 9/11 attack. But it does acknowledge the very real grievances and sense of hopelessness that afflict millions in the Arab world today, and the special obligation of the charitable sector, given its background and traditions, to respond to these unheard voices, and to raise the banner of social justice at least as high as the banner of military might. This, it seems to me, is one of the unique contributions that American philanthropy can make to the 9/11 response and therefore part of the special message that 9/11 holds for the charitable sector.

Fortunately, some charitable institutions have moved in precisely this direction. One striking example is the Ford Foundation's Social Justice Philanthropy Project, which is consciously seeking to promote charitable giving for social justice causes overseas. Another is the Gates Foundation's commitment to assault the global AIDS crisis. But these examples need to be multiplied many times and a major effort launched to re-position American charitable organizations at the center of a global campaign to achieve the "decent standard of living for all individual men and women and children in all nations" that Franklin Roosevelt pledged 60 years ago. This would be a lasting legacy of 9/11 indeed.

PROMOTING CIVIL SOCIETY

A final long-term message American charities could usefully take out of the September 11 tragedy is the special obligation they have to help promote the civil society sector in the Arab world. America's success in eliminating Islamic terrorism may ultimately depend, after all, less on the precision of our military strikes than on the persistence of our efforts to foster alternative vehicles through which would-be Islamic extremists can contribute to their societies. And civil society organizations are one of the most promising of these alternatives.

This, at any rate, is one of the major lessons of the recent history of Latin America and Central Europe, where such organizations have played vital roles in the battles for democracy and economic progress. While the social and cultural life of the Arab region may offer a less hospitable climate for the flowering of such organizations, the circumstances may not be all that different. After all, at the time of the last major cataclysm to strike the West — the Castro Revolution of 1960 — much of Latin America, too, was ruled by a narrow oligarchy propped up by a conservative religious elite. Although the initial reaction to this cataclysm, too, was military (the Bay of Pigs invasion), ultimately the West pursued a quite different, and more successful, course: the promotion of local development and the active encouragement of grass-roots nonprofit organizations.

Thus, for example, the Latin American Catholic Church, freed by the Second Vatican Council from conservative control in the mid-1960s, began dispatching clerics into the Latin American hinterland to form Comunidades Eclesias de Base, or Church Base Communities, through which the rural poor could take some control of their lives. Over 100,000 such organizations are said to have been created in Brazil alone. The U.S. government contributed to this effort as well through the Peace Corps and a little-known agency called the Inter-American Foundation, which delivered critical capacity-building assistance to grass-roots non-governmental organizations and the networks that supported them. U.S. foundations like Ford, Rockefeller, and Kellogg also joined in this effort, providing additional critical support to the emerging Latin American civil society sector.

Interestingly, many of the activists in the resulting non-governmental organizations came from social strata quite similar to those of the 9/11 terrorists. They were doctors, lawyers, engineers, and other educated professionals frustrated by the grinding poverty and inequality of their region and determined to make a contribution to the life-chances of their peoples. Thanks in part to the support they received, however, they were able to channel their passions not into building terrorist cells but into helping impoverished peasants and urban squatters create micro-enterprises and marketing cooperatives, build village water systems, and establish health clinics. In the process, they fostered democratic norms, trained a new generation of community leaders, created hope, and gave tangible meaning to abstract concepts like self-determination.

NGOs played similar roles in the recent democratic breakthroughs in Central Europe and South Africa, channeling the energies of local activists into positive political and economic change, and nurturing habits of reciprocity and trust. Charter 77 in Czechoslovakia, the Hungarian social services cooperative LARAS, the Polish Environmental Circle, and Solidarnoc itself are just a few examples of this vibrant organizational scene. Indeed, the dramatic political events that led to the collapse of the Communist regimes in Central and Eastern Europe in 1989 were preceded by two decades of change beneath the surface of Central European society, and voluntary organizations were very much at the center of them. Here, again, moreover, outside support was quite important, including support by philanthropic institutions such as the Rockefeller Brothers Fund.

Whether similar possibilities exist in the Arab world is open to reasonable doubt. Church and state are far more fused in Islam than in the West, leaving far less space for organized private action. Beyond this, radical Islam has already filled much of the space that exists with its own organizations that blend social aid with religious indoctrination. Some of these, we have now learned, may even have functioned as conduits for charitable support of terrorism. Finally, the ethos of individual initiative so central to the NGO concept is far less prominent in Arab culture.

But these are more excuses than explanations. In truth, a vibrant associational revolution is under way throughout the Arab world today just as it was in Latin America and Central Europe two decades ago.¹¹ Some 15,000 associations are operating in Egypt alone and the number recorded in Morocco is reportedly twice that. Pakistan now boasts a rich array of secular welfare organizations like the All Pakistan Women's Association and the Hilal-e-Ahmer Society, religiously affiliated service agencies such as Al-Khidmat, and large foreign-aid-financed organizations like the Orangi Pilot Project and the Aga Khan Rural Support Corporation that offer important alternatives to radical religious movements and terror cells as routes to a better life for the rural poor.

As in America, many of the Arab world's nonprofit organizations have deep religious roots, but not all are controlled by fundamentalists. Islam has a potent tradition of charitable

... the dramatic political events that led to the collapse of the Communist regimes in Central and Eastern Europe in 1989 were preceded by two decades of change beneath the surface of Central European society, and voluntary organizations were very much at the center of them.

As the carriers of the American civil society tradition, American charities should react to September 11 instead by redoubling their commitment to promoting civil society in the Arab world, and by encouraging the government to do likewise.

endeavor embodied in its concept of zakat, which creates a religious obligation to devote a portion of one's income to the community; and the religious principle of tsadakah, or giving aid to those in need, which is mentioned no less than thirty times in the Quran. This provides a powerful religious grounding for the region's nonprofit organizations.

While U.S. charities and governmental authorities have hardly been blind to the emergence of a vibrant civil society sector in the Arab World,¹² U.S. government support for the Arab region's non-governmental organizations has been uneven and narrow, and U.S. foundation support, so crucial in Latin America and Central Europe, has been far less in evidence. Worse yet, the PATRIOT Act and subsequent regulations promulgated in the wake of 9/11, far from encouraging support to the civil society sector in the Arab world, have put a serious chill on it. These regulations authorize the government to freeze the assets of any U.S. charity that aids an organization found by the Executive Branch to be associated with terrorism. But the definition of what constitutes association with terrorism is quite vague and the burden of ensuring that supported organizations are not so associated is left to the charities.¹³ Under the circumstances, it is no wonder that charities in the Arab world are finding their external support dwindling, thus weakening Arab civil society at precisely the time when its presence is most urgently needed.

As the carriers of the American civil society tradition, American charities should react to September 11 instead by redoubling their commitment to promoting civil society in the Arab world, and by encouraging the government to do likewise. This would apply to the Arab region the lesson that Alexis de Tocqueville taught us 170 years ago, and that the Inter-American Foundation and Vaclav Havel reiterated more recently: in the battle against terror and the despair that gives rise to it, it may be less in our command of military might than in our mastery of "the art of associating together" that our true competitive advantage may lie.

CONCLUSION

The time for celebrating charity's response to 9/11 or worrying about how this response is affecting the flow of charitable resources to other nonprofit organizations is well past for America's charitable sector. Foundations and nonprofit groups must now turn their attention more fully to the deeper implications of 9/11 for America's charities. This will require committing, or recommitting, themselves to building cross-sectoral partnerships, promoting social justice, and encouraging the growth of global civil society, especially in the Arab region. These hold the real meaning of September 11 for the nonprofit world and those it serves.

¹² The Ford Foundation, for example, has maintained an office in Egypt for years through which it has channeled important support to Arab NGOs, and the U.S. Agency for International Development has also delivered important aid to Egyptian NGOs.

The Philanthropic Response to September 11

Lessons from Relief and Recovery in New York City

The terrorist strikes of September 11, 2001, were the worst attacks on U.S. soil by a foreign enemy since the War of 1812. At the World Trade Center, the toll was 2,823 dead or missing. The attack on the Pentagon resulted in 184 people dead or missing, and 40 died in the airplane crash in Pennsylvania. Some 25 million square feet of downtown New York office space (about two and a half times the total amount of office space in Buffalo) was destroyed or severely damaged. About 700 downtown New York small businesses were destroyed and over 7,000 residents were evacuated. The New York City Partnership and Chamber of Commerce estimated that the city lost 125,000 jobs in the last three months of 2001 as a direct result of the attack. The nation was tragically unprepared for the nature and scope of the attacks. As a result, governmental, private, and philanthropic organizations were forced to create, in the midst of turmoil and grief, new procedures to respond to the disaster.

TOM SEESSEL
THOMAS EDISON STATE
COLLEGE OF NEW JERSEY

Philanthropic organizations . . . responded with unaccustomed speed and agility.

Americans and people throughout the world responded generously to the worst terrorist attacks in U.S. history. Independent Sector, a nonprofit organization dedicated to advancing the work of nonprofit and philanthropic groups, in a survey taken in mid-October 2001, found that 58 percent of Americans had given money to a 9/11-related cause, and the Internal Revenue Service reported that 262 new tax-exempt charitable organizations had been created. There was such an outpouring of donations that the American Red Cross stopped soliciting for its 9/11 Liberty Fund on October 31, 2001, having raised $543 million, by far the largest amount ever contributed in the aftermath of one disaster. Despite cessation of fundraising, another approximately $424 million was contributed by June 2002. To respond to the widening tangle of interrelated problems, on the afternoon of September 11 two leading New York City philanthropic organizations, the New York Community Trust and the United Way of New York City, announced formation of a new joint venture, the September 11th Fund, and within less than two weeks donations totaling more than $115 million had been received. Within four months, the September 11th Fund received contributions totaling about $425 million from more than two million donors in all fifty states, three U.S. protectorates, and 150 countries. The response was so large that the fund announced on January 16 that it no longer wished to receive contributions, but by July 2002 another approximately $76 million had been donated.

This report, commissioned by the Ford Foundation and conducted under the auspices of Thomas Edison State College of New Jersey, examines the philanthropic response to 9/11 and focuses on key aspects of the relief and recovery efforts in New York City. It draws on interviews with more than one hundred individuals conducted in 2002 and 2003, including the chief executives of major independent and corporate foundations, the largest relief charities and uniformed rescue workers' funds, leading nonprofit service providers and intermediary organizations, government officials, and individuals and businesses affected by the disaster. The report goes further by attempting to place philanthropic programs in a larger context through a closer look at the scope, coverage, and difficulties of government programs in 9/11 relief and recovery in New York City. It seeks to increase public understanding of lessons learned in the overall government-philanthropic relief effort, highlight unresolved public policy issues arising from the 9/11 experience, and suggest an approach to enhancing our preparedness for future similar events.

The September 11, 2001, attack on the World Trade Center caused widespread suffering and disrupted life throughout the city and tri-state region. It occurred at a time of worsening economic conditions characterized by job cuts, city and state budget reductions, and decreases in philanthropic donations. Despite lack of a reliable roadmap, philanthropic organizations, including donors and service providers, responded with unaccustomed speed and agility to the urgent humanitarian needs in both the immediate vicinity of the attack and in the wider New York region. Providing for the short- and long-term financial needs of families of people who died or were seriously injured was a major part of the philanthropic response. This was facilitated by Congress' extraordinary action opening the way for victim compensation payments by exempting charities from the long-standing requirement that recipients of charitable funds be financially needy.

Private philanthropic responses were launched well before it was known what assistance would be available from the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), the lead federal disaster organization. Foundation and corporate grants financed a diversity of activities addressing every known consequence of the calamity, ranging from providing immediate cash assistance for families who lost their primary breadwinner or were displaced from their homes, to therapy for grief and post-traumatic stress; these activities also maintained continuity of critical nonprofit service provision and public broadcasting, and helped very small businesses and their low wage workforces.

There was intense media scrutiny of philanthropic organizations, prompted by the record amount of donations. The focus of attention became a comparison between how much had been contributed and how much had been distributed, which depicted philanthropy as a frictionless conveyor belt that speedily moves money from donors to recipients. The reputation of charitable organizations was not helped by the decision of the American Red Cross to allocate a portion of the Liberty Fund for other than 9/11 purposes after its fundraising appeals had implied that all contributions would be used for 9/11 relief.

Charts showing a gap between receipts and expenditures frequently failed to point out that a part of the difference between the two figures represented items such as scholarship funds, which are paid out over a period of more than twenty years. The focus on spending compared with receipts, without digging deeper into the challenges of allocating philanthropic money wisely and effectively, was evident in every type of media.

On the philanthropic side, some donors, including the Lilly Endowment, which contributed $30 million, did not issue press releases on its support for 9/11 relief. Some agencies, such as the American Red Cross in the first few months, appeared to feel it was not necessary to answer questions about their work and antagonized reporters with what may have seemed to be evasiveness, flip-flops, or stonewalling. On the other hand, the low-key Salvation Army got a break from the New York Times when a reporter learned that the Army's antiquated computer system could generate only a fraction of the enormous volume of checks it was committed to issuing to cover basic needs such as food and rent and agreed to hold the story until the computers had been upgraded.

Philanthropists are not accustomed to doing their work in the glare of the media spotlight, and many bristle at not being appreciated for their good works. The combination of media over-simplification and philanthropic thin skins produced an unhappy interaction. Only a few organizations, most notably the September 11th Fund, invested significant time and resources in trying to explain the dilemmas, excruciating choices, and nuances of philanthropic decision-making to the media, and those that didn't follow this lead suffered for it. The story line implied that the philanthropic organizations were at best inefficient and slow moving, at worst venal and self-serving. By neglecting the public relations aspects of its work, much of philanthropy did little to counteract this image. Research and interviews for this report suggest a different version of reality, one that the following pages seek to convey.

Foundation and corporate grants financed a diversity of activities addressing every known consequence of the calamity. . . .

Philanthropic planning was complicated by the proliferation of new charities created to address 9/11 relief and recovery. . . .

Normally, foundations spend months studying problems before settling on a program strategy. In the wake of 9/11 they felt the need to respond quickly, so that victims and their families could know what help was available. Fundamental questions of philanthropic purpose, efficacy, fairness, accountability to donors, and efficiency needed to be addressed. Is the main purpose of philanthropy in the wake of such an unprecedented disaster to provide cash gifts in an effort to compensate people for the lost lives and income-earning potential of loved ones? Is money the most effective form of assistance? What are the criteria for who gets how much? Should survivor families be supported in their customary standard of living, or should all families receive equal amounts? What portion of donations should be earmarked to respond to problems that would only later become apparent, such as financial need after expiration of health insurance and unemployment benefits and treatment for post traumatic stress syndrome? How could charities prevent fraud in the distribution of funds and services without creating burdensome red tape and delays? Overlaying all these questions was uncertainty about what and how much would be provided by federal and state government, when, and for which groups of victims.

Philanthropic planning was complicated by the proliferation of new charities created to address 9/11 relief and recovery, many of which had inexperienced leadership and vaguely defined plans. New victim relief funds, such as those established by firms that lost large numbers of employees in the Twin Towers, faced the problem of how to make their payments in compliance with long-standing federal law governing tax-exempt entities requiring that these payments be made to individuals only upon a determination of financial need. Many 9/11 victims did not qualify under this standard. To be able to accomplish their purpose of providing financial help to the surviving families, organizers of victim relief funds, including fire and police unions, persuaded Congress to pass the Victims of Terrorism Tax Relief Act of 2001, which included a special one-time exemption from this rule for payments to victims of terrorist and anthrax attacks occurring between September 11 and December 31.

Congress added a new pool of resources by enacting an open-ended program of financial benefits, the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, which provided compensation to families of persons killed or physically injured as a result of the attacks and who agreed to waive their right to bring lawsuits against the airlines or any other public or private entity.¹ Awards from the Fund would ultimately reach a total of about $5 billion, for approximately 3,200 eligible claimants, including nationals of sixty-one different countries. The $5 billion sum is about twice as much as the total philanthropic amount donated for all 9/11-related purposes.

Foundation information and networking organizations activated mechanisms through which grantmakers could learn what was being done and planned by others. The Foundation Center, the nation's leading source of information about foundations, began collecting detailed information about the philanthropic response and posted the data on its Web site. The Foundation Center also maintained an updated online chronological log of key 9/11-related events and spotlighted the philanthropic response to 9/11 at its 45th anniversary meeting on November 12.

The Carnegie Corporation of New York convened a meeting September 28 that was attended by leaders and other representatives of over fifty corporations, foundations, and government agencies to encourage the sharing of information on the philanthropic response. The New York Regional Association of Grantmakers, a nonprofit membership organization, hosted a meeting October 5 at the Ford Foundation for the exchange of information and published, in early 2002, the first comprehensive report on special relief funds established to respond to 9/11. Ford Foundation president Susan V. Berresford organized an informal group of her counterparts in about fifteen large independent foundations to keep each other informed of their plans and grant commitments. This process began with informal consultations and then an October 1 conference call, after which the foundation executives updated each other through regular e-mails consolidated and distributed through Thanksgiving by Berresford's office.

Citigroup Foundation president Charles Raymond initiated a series of meetings with other groups raising funds for scholarship programs that led to formation of the September 11th Scholarship Alliance, a consortium of philanthropies that created a $100 million fund administered by the Citizens' Scholarship Foundation of America. Informal affinity groups, such as a group of funders for children's causes that met at the Hasbro Children's Foundation September 25, also began conferring. Corporate foundations set up an e-mail communication network through the Conference Board, a worldwide nonprofit business organization. The Better Business Bureau Serving Metropolitan New York posted on its Web site information on charities that were offering 9/11 aid, and the New York State Attorney General and the Nonprofit Coordinating Committee of New York did the same.

The improvised responses that helped thousands of people also exposed significant flaws in our public-private approach to disaster relief. Public and voluntary agencies moved quickly to establish one-stop disaster assistance centers with personnel from key agencies. However, they were slow to develop common intake forms and procedures as well as coordinated case management, which could have saved time and maximized assistance for grief-stricken and traumatized individuals. The experience of the 9/11 United Services Group, described later in this report, offers useful lessons in coordinating the efforts of different agencies and developing a unified case management system for victims.

The improvised responses that helped thousands of people also exposed significant flaws in our public-private approach to disaster relief.

... by narrowly interpreting the law, FEMA officials failed to take into account the widespread economic impacts ...

PRECEDENTS AND THE ROLE OF FEMA

Not since the San Francisco earthquake of 1906 had a catastrophic event in this country produced such a widespread impact on the densely populated economic and social fabric of a city. There were inevitable comparisons with the 1995 bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, which claimed 168 victims. However, as a FEMA official put it, “That was child’s play compared to the World Trade Center.”

There was a difference not only in the death toll, but also the relative ease with which Oklahoma City victims could be confirmed dead. And there was almost no economic ripple impact from the Murrah Building bombing. That building was in a low-density area, and the five nearby buildings that were destroyed all housed branch offices of large organizations that could readily find new locations for their employees. No uniformed officers died trying to rescue people in Oklahoma City.

In Oklahoma City, it was relatively simple to gather the approximately 25 to 30 important public and private philanthropic agencies around one table for joint decision-making. In New York City — whose foreign-born population alone exceeds Oklahoma City’s total population by a factor of 5.7 to 1 — there are an estimated 10,000 to 20,000 nonprofit human service organizations that have carved out their own niches defined by services offered, geographic area, and ethnic client base. Many of these agencies have substantial contracts with city and state government to deliver a wide range of health and social welfare services to vulnerable groups and individuals.

Nor was FEMA’s experience from other disasters very helpful. In numerous meetings and other communications with officials of philanthropic organizations in New York City, FEMA officials repeatedly said that the “historical role for private funds is in long-term recovery, as responsibility for recovery moves from government to the community.” But this was an over-simplification and implied that FEMA, the major source of federal government disaster aid, would provide immediate assistance to meet human needs. Yet FEMA programs such as mortgage and rental assistance soon became bogged down in confusion and delays. In addition, by narrowly interpreting the law, FEMA officials failed to take into account the widespread economic — as opposed to immediate physical — impacts of the attacks. Philanthropy was able to move quickly to meet the mounting needs. In the first six months after the attacks, FEMA distributed only about $81 million through its entire individual and family assistance programs in New York City, and, with rare exceptions, undocumented workers were not eligible.

² Total FEMA financial aid covering all purposes for the World Trade Center disaster in this six-month period was $923 million, and all except the $81 million for individual and family assistance was allocated for public infrastructure repairs, debris removal, and reimbursement of certain New York City and State expenses such as environmental remediation, overtime payments, liability insurance for contractors working on the clean-up, and lump-sum payments made to beneficiaries of New York City firefighters who died in responding to the attack.

FEMA's $81 million paid for temporary housing, mortgage and rental assistance, individual and family grants, disaster unemployment insurance, victim compensation, crisis counseling, and disaster food stamps.² In May, FEMA made a $132 million grant to New York State's Project Liberty for crisis counseling "to help people understand their current situation . . . [and] move forward with their lives."

Much greater amounts had been made available by FEMA for individual and family assistance in the wake of other recent calamities: $1.4 billion for the Northridge, California, earthquakes in 1994 and $1 billion for Hurricane George in Puerto Rico in 1998. Curtis Carleton, chief of FEMA's community and family services branch, explained that the wide disparity was rooted in FEMA's mission and capacities. "Most disasters," he said in an interview, "are floods and don't result in the loss of jobs. FEMA is geared to reimburse people for things like homes and automobiles that are swept away. The mortgage and rental assistance program is little used, because in a typical flood there are no businesses affected and therefore no income interruption." In New York City, by contrast, the impacts were much more widespread and diverse, and a philanthropic response was needed to help meet these challenges.

After months of criticism and Congressional pressure, during which FEMA justified its low rate of expenditures in part by saying that private philanthropy had acted too generously and too quickly, on June 28, 2002, FEMA announced a liberalization of its mortgage and rental assistance program guidelines, to help lawful U.S. residents who suffered at least a 25 percent income loss as a result of the attack avoid eviction from their dwellings. Residents who lived or worked anywhere in Manhattan and suffered financially "may be eligible," the carefully worded FEMA press release said. (Under FEMA guidelines up to that point, applicants for mortgage and rental assistance needed to meet the more stringent test of demonstrating that their income loss was the "direct result" of the attack.)

The June 28 announcement also said that people whose residence or place of business was not located in Manhattan, but who had "economically dependent relationships with firms in Manhattan, and consequently suffered financially, may be eligible." By July 17, FEMA reported that it had approved 5,147 applications out of 11,202 that were submitted, for a total of about $32 million in mortgage and rental assistance payments.

In March, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-NY) announced that the total FEMA commitment for the World Trade Center disaster would ultimately reach nearly $10 billion, most of which would be for similar purposes as the initial $923 million. The total federal commitment for New York City's recovery is estimated ultimately to reach a total of $25 billion, with the non-FEMA $15 billion allocated principally for various lower Manhattan business and residential incentives and rebuilding mass transit, roads, and telecommunications and energy infrastructure. This sum dwarfs the estimated $2 billion to $2.5 billion total made available through all philanthropic resources for all locations that suffered 9/11 losses.

"FEMA is geared to reimburse people for things like homes and automobiles that are swept away."

Despite their unmatched largesse, all of the victim compensation funds drew bitter criticism. . . .

VICTIM COMPENSATION FUNDS

By far the largest category of both government and philanthropic aid for individuals and families was the unprecedented programs for victim compensation. These provided payments, without regard to financial need, to the families of the approximately 3,200 people who died or were severely injured. About $5 billion of a total $6.8 billion in federal humanitarian aid was for this purpose, through the Victim Compensation Fund. Beneficiaries were required to waive their right to sue the airlines, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the City of New York, or any other domestic entity.

Charities gave upwards of $800 million to compensate many of the same 3,200 families, representing about 30 percent of all philanthropic distributions. To facilitate payment, Congress did away with the long-standing criterion of financial need for receipt of charitable donations. This created an impression that one of the purposes of philanthropy is to compensate for lost life, representing a departure from traditional expectations about the role of the sector.

Despite their unmatched largesse, all of the victim compensation funds drew bitter criticism and many were sued by beneficiaries, who complained that the formulas were flawed in one respect or another, most often because of alleged under-payments. Although some beneficiaries argued that the awards were too low, others — such as victims of other terrorist attacks and low-wage workers — questioned why some payments were so high.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE FUNDING FOR OTHER NEEDS

Apart from the federal Victim Compensation Fund, government and philanthropy provided roughly equal amounts — approximately $1.8 billion each — for individual, family, community, and economic needs. However, the allocations for program areas differed markedly. About 60 percent of the government's $1.8 billion was in the form of grants and low-interest loans for small businesses in Lower Manhattan and Chinatown, many of which employed large numbers of low-wage workers. Outside of victim compensation payments, the majority of philanthropy's $1.8 billion went to human services programs and needs-based financial assistance.

FEMA's individual assistance programs have been criticized by the public, the media and Congressional representatives. FEMA's eligibility requirements for its mortgage and rental assistance program were so restrictive that Congress enacted special legislation liberalizing the rules. Nevertheless, by extending the application deadlines several times, FEMA distributed about $87.7 million by December 26, 2002, about a month before the deadline; this was more than four times the amount it awarded in all previous disasters combined.

FEMA's individual and family grants program, administered by the New York State Department of Labor, became bogged down by its paper-based application process, prompting FEMA to dispatch a team of 150 employees to help unravel the problems. Moreover, a major segment of those in need, undocumented immigrants and most of those who arrived after August 1996, were not eligible for these and other government benefits, with the significant exception of the Victim Compensation Fund.

To its credit, as of late December 2002, FEMA had awarded some $165 million to the state for its Project Liberty, a short-term, outreach-based crisis counseling program that operates through some sixty-eight public and private agencies at over one hundred locations. This grant amount is almost as large as the total awarded in all previous disasters combined. However, only about $65 million of this had actually been obligated as of the end of 2002, and limitations on longer term therapy prompted philanthropic sources to provide approximately $50 million to meet this need.

The small business assistance programs funded with special Congressional appropriations and administered by Empire State Development, a quasi-independent state agency, were criticized for disbursing payments too slowly and for failing to cover losses adequately. Loans from another source, the U.S. Small Business Administration, require collateral, which presented difficulties for business owners who lost their business and had to secure a business loan with their home. Some observers have questioned the use of federal community development block grant funds, intended to aid low- to moderate-income neighborhoods and citizens, to induce large companies and affluent residential tenants to remain in or relocate to lower Manhattan.

MEETING HEALTH NEEDS

In an example of unusual government flexibility to meet an emergency, New York City's Human Resources Administration implemented a four-month Disaster Relief Medicaid Program with liberalized income limits, no asset test, and a greatly simplified application. This approach succeeded in enrolling about 350,000 people, about ten times as many as normally enroll in a comparable time period. The program received significant philanthropic support, from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, the United Hospital Fund of New York, and the Kaiser Family Foundation.

The Environmental Protection Agency released studies in late 2002 that were generally reassuring about air quality. However, in a special federally funded program, community and occupational clinicians screening on-site rescue workers found high incidences of respiratory problems and other lung-related complaints. In response to intense pressure from residents and elected officials, the EPA announced in May 2002 that it would, for the first time ever in a disaster, pay for indoor clean-up, testing, and environmental remediation for any resident south of Canal Street who requested it. EPA estimated there were 20,000 to 30,000 eligible residences.

In another effort to respond to public concerns outside the boundaries of statutory disaster relief programs, the New York City and federal government cooperated on establishing a registry that will track the health status of some 100,000 to 200,000 people who lived or worked near the World Trade Center site between September 11, 2001, and June 30, 2002, in an attempt to measure short- and long-term health effects.

The small business assistance programs . . . were criticized for disbursing payments too slowly and for failing to cover losses adequately.

LARGE INDEPENDENT FOUNDATIONS

The Foundation Center reported in February, 2002, that nineteen large independent (non-corporate related) foundations had each donated $1 million or more for 9/11 purposes, amounting to a total of about $166 million. This represented 78 percent of a total of about $212 million in donations by 215 independent foundations for which information was available. The $166 million donated by the nineteen large foundations amounted to about 3.7 percent of their aggregate annual giving in the most recent year. Two of the nineteen large foundation donors, the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation and the Lilly Endowment, contributed just under half of the $166 million, with Mellon making the largest pledge, $50 million, and Lilly giving $30 million. All of the ten large foundations interviewed for this report said that giving for 9/11 did not cause any diminution in their regular giving programs and commitments.

The section below describes giving by the 13 private foundations that donated $3 million or more.

Andrew W. Mellon Foundation

Headquartered in New York, Mellon, which has a long-standing record of support for museums, research libraries, and the performing arts, established a $50 million fund to assist large and small New York City cultural and performing arts organizations that were affected in such ways as cancelled performances, reduced tourism, cancelled fundraising events, and, in some cases, physical damage. The Mellon Foundation also included assistance for a new group of organizations — parks and branch libraries — because, as T. Dennis Sullivan, special advisor to Mellon president William G. Bowen, explained in an interview, “These were places where people went for solace or renewal in the aftermath of the attack.”

In arriving at the $50 million figure, Mellon took into account foundations’ obligations under federal law to pay out an amount equal to at least five percent of their assets annually. Mellon needed to increase its spending by approximately $18 million in 2001 to meet this federal requirement, and the staff and trustees saw the 9/11 response as an opportunity to fulfill this obligation; another $32 million was added to establish the fund. The $50 million expenditure represented about one quarter of Mellon’s usual annual giving level of $175–$200 million.

The first three of Mellon’s approximately 119 grants from its fund were to intermediary “re-granting” organizations that in turn leveraged the Mellon dollars with other grants and, with the assistance of panels including outside reviewers, made awards to small resident theatres, dance companies, individual artists, and music groups. Mellon’s direct awards to larger institutions were announced in three groups: January 30, March 12, and May 21, 2002. In a departure from traditional philanthropic and government grantmaking for the Arts, Mellon-funded awards were based not on artistic merit, but rather on a dollars and cents accounting of actual losses. The program officer overseeing the fund, Catherine Wichterman, believes that the Mellon grants made up for about half of the documented aggregate losses of the organizations that applied for assistance.

Lilly Endowment

Based in Indianapolis, Lilly, the nation's second largest philanthropy in terms of assets (after the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation), and the second-largest donor for 9/11-related purposes, has traditionally provided support for emergencies and had little difficulty in deciding on its grant strategy. On September 12 the Endowment allotted $10 million each to three of its long-standing grantees: the American Red Cross, Salvation Army, and (for the September 11th Fund) the United Way of America. Because the Endowment did not at the time maintain a Web site or issue press releases on these grants, the Foundation Center learned of the awards from the grantees. As Thomas Lofton, chairman of the Endowment for eleven years, explained in an interview, "We are more interested in doing our work than in telling the world about it." The Endowment made a $4.4 million grant to the Salvation Army to support training of its staff and volunteers in responding more effectively to future disasters, both natural and terrorist.

Ford Foundation

Ford, one of the nation's largest private foundation in assets, also looked to trusted organizations to become recipients of its 9/11 grants. This not only increased Ford's confidence that its funds would be used well, but also shortened the "due diligence" process of understanding the operations and capacities of a prospective grant recipient. Ford Foundation president Berresford took special care on September 11 and in the following weeks, as Ford worked out its response, to involve her staff and give them the sense that they were making not only a professional but also a personal contribution to relief and recovery. Thus, when the grant award letters were sent out, they were accompanied by sheets containing the signatures of all the foundation's staff members, who had assembled for signing ceremonies at all of the foundation's worldwide locations.

The Fund for the City of New York, a nonprofit organization that had been established with a grant from the Ford Foundation in 1968, received $1 million from Ford to augment its fund for low-cost cash-flow loans to nonprofit organizations providing critical services whose operations or finances were disrupted by the attack. FCNY leveraged Ford's grant with new grants and loans totaling $5.5 million from other donors, and by May had made 64 loans totaling $4,670,500 to 9/11-affected nonprofits. One recipient, the Coalition for Hispanic Family Services, administers a foster care program for over 200 children, under contract with the city Administration for Children's Services. The ACS offices, a few blocks from ground zero, were closed for two weeks, slowing payments to the coalition and other nonprofit organizations. As a result, the coalition was at risk of not being able to make its payments to foster families, thus jeopardizing the children's basic needs. FCNY stepped in with a $120,000 cash-flow loan to avert this.

Ford, one of the nation's largest private foundations in assets, also looked to trusted organizations to become recipients of its 9/11 grants.

The New York Post and Times reported that the anonymous donor had been mayor-elect Michael Bloomberg.

The Nonprofit Finance Fund, a nonprofit community development financial institution established in 1980, was given $1 million for financial and technical assistance to nonprofit organizations that suffered financial and physical damage. NFF leveraged Ford's grant with another $6.4 million in grants from numerous groups and the resulting Nonprofit Recovery Fund became a source of grants to nonprofit and public organizations that experienced a business loss due to physical damage, extraordinary expenses in recovering from 9/11, and interruptions of earned and contributed income. By mid-June, 2002, NFF had made 129 such grants totaling nearly $7.2 million. The largest grant, $509,000, was awarded to the Borough of Manhattan Community College, which occupies several locations between Chambers Street and North Moore Street, just to the north of ground zero, and suffered the loss of a building housing over forty classrooms.

Other large Ford grants included $5 million for the September 11th Fund, to which the foundation also loaned several of its grantmaking and administrative staff persons; $1.2 million for the Washington Regional Association of Grantmakers to assist nonprofit organizations handling an increased need for counseling and other support for persons affected by the attack on the Pentagon; $1 million for WNYC-New York City public radio to help replace its destroyed FM transmitter; $1 million for the Legal Aid Society for services to low-income people; $300,000 for a media-training program for Ford grantees in the human rights and international cooperation field to help them articulate, on television and in other forums, why respect for American constitutional protections, such as the right to a public trial, are not inconsistent with national security; and $1 million to Seedco for a small business and workforce retention program downtown and in Chinatown.

Carnegie Corporation of New York

On September 17, this Manhattan-based foundation announced a $10 million pledge for 9/11 relief efforts, saying it "expects to support institutions and organizations that offer assistance to or work in the area of educational and social needs." In December, before it had acted on this pledge, Carnegie received a $10 million anonymous gift for distribution to "small- and medium-sized arts and cultural organizations in New York City that are struggling in the aftermath" of 9/11. (In April, 2002, the New York Post and Times reported that the anonymous donor had been mayor-elect Michael Bloomberg.) Carnegie's awards to 137 institutions from this gift were announced on February 13, 2002.

On March 2, 2002, Carnegie announced the first grants under its original $10 million pledge, by then termed a three-year commitment by Carnegie president Vartan Gregorian, for 9/11 relief efforts: $1.85 million to assist public schools in lower Manhattan "in honor of the teachers who played such a critical role in the wake of the attack. . . ." Of the $1.85 million, $800,000 was for model libraries in two elementary schools, a use of funds evocative of the philanthropy of founder Andrew Carnegie a century earlier. On March 4, Carnegie's second installment of $1.6 million was awarded, to support public information on 9/11-related events, to WNYC-public radio and WNET-public television in New York City, National Public Radio, Boston's WBUR-public radio, and PBS' NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.

John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation

The MacArthur Foundation stayed informed about the evolving philanthropic response through the Ford Foundation-coordinated e-mail updates and concluded that there was substantial and “chaotic” funding for immediate relief and rehabilitation, and decided, according to president Jonathan Fanton, that its “efforts would have more impact if directed to other important issues” consistent with three of the foundation’s basic themes: providing analysis and information; strengthening the U.S. and the world’s response to terrorism and understanding its underlying causes; and protecting civil liberties and constitutional guarantees and promoting adherence to international law. By the time of MacArthur’s regularly scheduled board meeting two weeks after 9/11, many of the foundation’s grantees working in these areas had inquired about fresh support to focus new attention on 9/11-related concerns. The board approved a $5 million allocation, and delegated authority to Fanton and the staff to make individual grant decisions as extensions of its existing work in the three fields.

The initial $3.2 million was awarded in fourteen grants by November 12, and the $1.8 million balance in fifteen grants made by January. The largest grant, for $500,000, went to the Public Broadcasting Service’s Frontline series of documentaries on the background of 9/11. Other large awards included a $400,000 grant for National Public Radio to help with the cost of correspondents sent to cover the war in Afghanistan, and $250,000 for Human Rights Watch “in support of efforts to monitor refugee flows and the effects of hostilities on civilian populations in sensitive areas abroad.”

In an interview, Fanton noted that the foundation took care to balance grants that could result in criticism of U.S. policy, such as Human Rights Watch or Physicians for Human Rights, with grants to organizations that “take terrorism seriously,” such as the Monterey Institute, which received $100,000 to assess the risk that weapons of mass destruction might move out of “weakened states and into the hands of terrorists.” Reflecting on MacArthur’s 9/11 grant experience at a Council on Foundations meeting April 30, 2002, Fanton said that his Chicago-based organization’s response would “no doubt” have been different if that city’s Sears Tower had been attacked. He also stressed to his fellow foundation executives the grantmaking principle of adhering “to your core values and grantees and program areas you know best,” and challenged his audience by saying “do not be afraid to be countercyclical — even if it is unpopular — look for the unfilled niche.”

Charles Stewart Mott Foundation

The regular fall board meeting of the Mott Foundation was conducted on September 12 by conference call. Staff were invited to join the meeting, which opened with prayers and readings from the Bible. The president of the foundation, William S. White, has the authority to approve grants, and the board supported his intention to contribute to 9/11 relief efforts. One of White’s first decisions was to allocate $1 million to the New York

[[Jonathan] Fanton stressed adhering “to your core values and grantees and program areas you know best.”

Community Trust for the September 11th Fund. “We can’t figure out what New York City needs from out here,” White said in an interview, “so I just told Lorie [Slutsky] she could use our grant for whatever she felt was necessary.”

There are large concentrations of Arab-Americans in Michigan, and Mott made grants to the American Arab Heritage Council in Flint, for programs “to promote better understanding and tolerance toward Flint area Arab Americans and Muslims,” and to the Arab Community Center for Economic and Social Services in Dearborn, “to help non-Arabs and non-Muslims better understand the Arab heritage, Middle Eastern culture and point of view, and Islam.” Mott also made four grants totaling $900,000 to local charities, such as the United Way and the Red Cross, to compensate them for donations they would have received but that were diverted to 9/11 relief.

White also registered his organization’s support for national economic recovery by instructing the foundation’s fund managers to place only “buy” orders when the New York Stock Exchange reopened September 17.

Robert Wood Johnson Foundation

Based in Princeton, New Jersey, about fifty miles south of ground zero, RWJF is the nation’s largest foundation devoted to health care. In its early senior management discussions about a response to the attacks, according to the foundation’s president at the time, Steven A. Schroeder, M.D., vice president Paul Jellinek urged a $100 million commitment as a “statement.” In a subsequent interview, Jellinek said that large portions of such a pledge would have been spent on health insurance benefits and to shore up the financial position of nonprofit health care providers, but this did not materialize.

RWJF’s initial announcement of its $5 million commitment, September 21, spoke of meeting the “immediate needs of the victims, their families, and the affected communities” in coordination with the September 11th Fund and other groups. Some months later, Schroeder recalled, “we saw the great outpouring of funds for these purposes and realized we weren’t as needed as we thought.”

To address the needs of low-asset individuals without health insurance after the attacks, the federal, state, and city governments created a temporary Disaster Relief Medicaid program that provided four months of benefits. There was a simplified application process with no questions asked about assets or immigration status and no documentation requirements. However, the city’s Human Resources Administration (HRA) possessed only limited capacity to implement the program quickly, and speed was the point of this emergency plan. To help move the effort forward, RWJF gave the United Hospital Fund of New York a $750,000 grant to augment HRA’s capacities for community education, outreach, and enrollment, an effort that succeeded in enrolling 70,000 new recipients. (This grant was not part of the foundation’s $5 million commitment because it was considered to be a part of RWJF’s existing program of enhancing access to the health care system for low-asset people.) The foundation also encouraged some of its existing grantees to direct attention to 9/11-related efforts, such as Finding Our Way, a program offering a “short course on death and dying in America today,” and Faith in Action, a public education and community action program to stimulate interfaith volunteer coalitions.

Rockefeller Foundation

The New York-based Rockefeller Foundation’s areas of 9/11 assistance were extensions of its pre-existing programs to assist low-wage workers, especially immigrants; to strengthen the capacity of community-based organizations in immigrant communities to help families and individuals applying for benefits; and to protect civil liberties. Meetings at the foundation with immigrant advocacy organizations, such as the New York Immigration Coalition, and labor unions, along with other funders, held in late September-early October, helped sharpen Rockefeller’s identification of needs.

Two of the foundation’s largest grants under its $5 million 9/11 commitment were $500,000 to the New York Foundation, to support its Immigrant Access Project in which Rockefeller funds were re-granted to more than twenty community-based ethnic organizations, and $500,000 to the Service Employees International Union to support a “multi-language outreach and information dissemination campaign” to help affected low-wage and immigrant workers to receive benefits.

Assistance for the protection of civil rights in Arab, South Asian, and Muslim communities was provided with the help of such Rockefeller grants as those awarded to the Islamic Circle of North America, the Arab-American Family Support Center, and Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund. The Rockefeller Foundation also made a $350,000 grant to the New York Foundation for the Arts to support its program of expertise and advocacy for arts organizations and artists affected by 9/11, and a $60,000 grant to help support the provision of equipment for rescue workers at the site.

Atlantic Philanthropies

This foundation, with offices in several countries and in New York City, made a $10 million grant to the September 11th Fund on September 16. City Meals on Wheels received $50,000 September 19, and another $100,000 on November 8.

Starr Foundation

The Starr Foundation in lower Manhattan, one of the nation’s largest philanthropies, had issued only one press release in its 47-year history prior to 9/11, announcing the appointment of its president, Florence A. Davis. The second release was on Starr’s initial $10 million commitment to 9/11 relief. According to Ms. Davis in an interview, the 9/11 release was “a way of showing that the city could come back and needed help.” Of the first $10 million pledge, $8 million was donated to the New York Police and Fire Widows’ and Children’s Benefit Fund, and the Police Foundation received $2 million for its mental health initiatives for police officers and their families. A gift of $250,000 was made to NYU Downtown Hospital “on the strength of an anguished phone call and no written proposal, because they had incurred significant unreimbursable expenses on and soon after 9/11,” Ms. Davis wrote in an e-mail. Near the end of 2001, the Starr Foundation gave “somewhere in the vicinity of $5 million” to emergency food providers and other human needs organizations whose services had been stretched beyond their resources in responding to 9/11-related problems.

John S. and James L. Knight Foundation

This Miami-based foundation initially committed $5 million over and above its expected annual grant level, and in December increased the amount to $10 million, for “secondary victims” of the attacks in the twenty-six communities participating in the Knight Foundation’s ongoing Community Partners Program, most of which are served by a Knight-Ridder newspaper. There were some 246 awards, ranging in size from $10,000 to $150,000, related to 9/11. One grant strengthened the ability of the Hunter Health Clinic, in Wichita, Kansas, to care for the increased number of patients without health insurance who had been laid off in the aircraft industry because of reduced travel after 9/11. Second Harvest in San Jose, California, received a grant to help meet the increased demand for free food resulting from the downturn in the technology sector.

Annie E. Casey Foundation

Based in Baltimore and dedicated to helping disadvantaged children and families, the Casey Foundation has a New York City office that played a key advisory role in strengthening the city’s Administration for Children’s Services. In deciding on its response to 9/11 in New York, the foundation looked to “people who had a relationship to us who we knew could reach needy families,” Steve Cohen, senior associate in charge of the New York City office, said. The largest share of Casey’s $3 million commitment expended as of July, 2002, $1.18 million, was given to New Yorkers for Children (NYFC), a nonprofit organization created to work closely with ACS.

NYFC leveraged Casey’s grant with a $1 million grant from the Freddie Mac Foundation and a $250,000 donation from the With Arms Wide Open Foundation, created by the rock band Creed. With these funds, NYFC set up the New York City Family Fund to make competitive grants to assist community-based organizations (CBOs) provide support for children and families affected by the World Trade Center attack. In July, 2002, the fund made its first grants, to twenty-one CBOs for services and advocacy for a broad group of victims throughout the city such as those who lost their jobs and for “community-wide convening and healing” activities.

Lumina Foundation for Education

Headquartered in Indianapolis, Lumina Foundation for Education initiated the Families of Freedom Scholarship Fund with a $3 million pledge to the Citizens' Scholarship Foundation of America in St. Peter, Minnesota. As of July, 2002, the fund had nearly reached its goal of $100 million to provide post-secondary scholarships for children of the people who were killed or seriously injured in New York, Pennsylvania, and at the Pentagon.

CORPORATIONS

According to the Foundation Center's February 2002 report, 555 corporations, corporate foundations, and business associations pledged or donated $641.8 million, representing about 43 percent of total giving; 47 corporations gave $5 million or more. Several firms that lost large numbers of employees in the World Trade Center attack established special new tax-exempt funds to provide for the needs of the survivors. Other corporations made donations from their established foundations or corporate giving programs.

Nineteen percent of the corporate and corporate foundation pledges went to their corporate relief funds, and 43 percent was designated for large relief funds such as the American Red Cross, September 11th Fund, and the three major uniformed rescue workers funds. Some examples of corporate giving follow.

Marsh & McLennan Companies, Inc.

This large financial services firm created the tax-exempt MMC Victims Relief Fund, to which it donated $20 million, and clients and friends contributed an additional $4 million. By June about $22 million of this had been distributed tax-free to the families of the 295 deceased employees through a formula based on number of children, years of service in the firm, and special needs, with a minimum payment of $25,000 per family. The remaining approximately $2 million was devoted to maintenance of health care coverage for three years. Survivor families also received — in addition to regular company benefits such as life insurance and pension plan distributions — taxable salary continuation through December and a taxable supplemental death benefit equal to 75 percent of the 2000 bonus.

Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, Inc.

Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, Inc. (KBW), an employee-owned securities broker/dealer and investment bank specializing in the financial services sector, occupied offices on the 88th and 89th floors of the South Tower. KBW's co-chairman and co-CEO, John Duffy, was driving on the West Side Highway to his office the morning of September 11 when he saw the attack, in which his son, his co-chairman/co-CEO, and 65 other fellow employees died. KBW established a tax-exempt charitable fund that raised about $11 million, including about $5 million from donated trading commissions on October 29-30. At year-end, KBW made initial payments from the fund of $5,000 for each decedent, plus $5,000 if they were married, and $5,000 for each child. Salary continuation through the end of 2001 and health insurance premiums, estimated at about $2 million over the next five years, are to be paid out of company profits³, and the families received cash payments for the value of their deceased's equity share of the firm.

KBW decided that these payments, plus cash that was available through the Red Cross, Robin Hood Relief Fund, Safe Horizon, and other sources, were ample to meet immediate needs and will devote the bulk of the fund to long-term assistance for KBW families: about $4.8 million was set aside to finance college scholarships for the victims' children, and a consulting firm, the Conservation Company (now called the TCC Group), was engaged to survey the families and make recommendations for how the fund can best meet their needs over time.

Citigroup Foundation

The Citigroup Foundation announced on September 14 creation of the Citigroup Relief Fund to raise funds for post-secondary scholarships for the children of victims, and opened a Web site for donations on September 20. The fund was also advertised on Citigroup's credit card statements. The Citigroup Foundation initiated the fund with a $15 million pledge over and above its usual annual giving level of about $75 million, and in the first six months some 8,000 donors had contributed about $5.2 million, including $67,000 from the citizens and volunteer fire department of Bozeman, Montana.

Citigroup Foundation president Charles V. Raymond worked with other organizations raising post-secondary scholarship funds to form the September 11 Scholarship Alliance, which developed a central registry of eligible children, a common application form, and unified administration through the forty-year old Citizens' Scholarship Foundation of America (CSFA). The Scholarship Alliance named its campaign the Families for Freedom Fund, and received the endorsement of former president Bill Clinton and his 1996 opponent, Bob Dole. As of early July, 2002, the fund had neared its $100 million goal with contributions from about twenty thousand people. William C. Nelsen, CSFA president, estimated that the $100 million would meet about seventy percent of the post-secondary education financial need of all 4,500-4,700 children whose parents were killed or permanently disabled in the attacks. (Some contributors to the fund also provided scholarships for spouses or domestic partners.)

New York Times Company Foundation

The Times Company Foundation, which raises about $8 million during the Christmas season for its Neediest Cases Fund, announced on September 12 the establishment of a companion 9/11 Neediest Cases Fund, expecting to raise about $4 million. In the end, about $60 million was contributed, causing the Times Company Foundation to look beyond its seven traditional social welfare agency recipients and create new programs, partners, and processes.

In 2000, the Times Company Foundation made 351 grants, mostly in the $5,000-$10,000 range. With the unexpected resources in the 9/11 Neediest Fund, it made sixty grants, a fourth of which were for $1 million or more. Of the $60 million raised, a little over half went to the seven large nonprofit organizations that provide direct services to individuals and families and are the traditional beneficiaries of the Times annual Neediest Cases appeals. Grants averaging $2.5 million each went to three foundations representing the uniformed services and law enforcement agencies; $5.7 million and $5.5 million, respectively, were donated to organizations offering school support services and trauma treatment; $3.1 million went for retention of low-wage jobs; and the balance was for various causes including Washington, DC relief activities. As is the practice with the annual Neediest Cases appeal, all administrative costs were paid by the New York Times Company so that 100 percent of all donations were passed through to the beneficiaries.

Goldman Sachs

This investment firm has several downtown locations, and the building it occupies at One Liberty Plaza was slightly damaged in the attack and could not reopen until October 24. The firm lost no employees, but forty-two of them lost a family member. To respond to this and other 9/11 relief efforts, Goldman Sachs established a relief fund and within a few weeks employees worldwide had donated about $6 million and the firm gave $5 million. A committee representing Goldman Sachs' major divisions, including staff at all levels, solicited recommendations from employees for fund distributions and met frequently to determine allocations, under instructions from the chairman, Henry M. Paulson, Jr., to "get the money in and get it out quickly"; the bulk was distributed by the end of 2001.

The largest share, $2.25 million, went to various charities supporting rescue workers' funds such as the New York Police and Fire Widows' and Children's Benefit Fund. Taxable gifts of $50,000 each were given to the families of the deceased relatives of Goldman Sachs employees, and just over $2 million went to two scholarship funds for victims' children. The approximately $5 million remaining went to some 25 organizations, including Safe Horizon, Seedco, and the union representing restaurant workers from Windows on the World. The Goldman Sachs Foundation, a separately incorporated entity, allocated about $2 million of its annual grantmaking of $12 million for 9/11, through grants to two organizations conducting programs to enhance mutual understanding among young people on a global level.

All administrative costs were paid by the New York Times Company so that 100 percent of all donations were passed through to the beneficiaries.

REGRANTING ORGANIZATIONS

Lorie Slutsky of the New York Community Trust echoes the sentiments of many people interviewed in saying, “The Red Cross were heroes from Day 1 to Day 21. They were disaster relief at its best. The Red Cross helped us make decisions we couldn’t have made without them.”

During this initial period, the Red Cross mobilized thousands of volunteers from the tri-state area and as far away as California, who helped open 12 shelters and provide food, clothing, emergency cash, and comfort to those who were physically injured, had a loved one missing, had been displaced from their home, had lost their job, or were simply overwhelmed by the enormity of the event. The Red Cross was also on the front lines, with the Salvation Army, in providing respite centers and care for the rescue workers.

The Red Cross was by far the largest beneficiary of 9/11-related donations, receiving almost $1 billion out of a total of about $2 billion–$2.5 billion. In the first five months after 9/11, the Red Cross spent $80 million on relief services, including thirteen million meals for disaster workers and victims, mental health services for over 200,000, and health services for 118,000. And by January 31, 2002, the organization had given $390 million in cash assistance to families of victims, injured persons, and to those who lost their homes or jobs. (Data are for all locations affected by the attacks.)

The Red Cross made special efforts to help people who were not in the mainstream of society. It opened a special tent across the street from the Pier 94 Family Assistance Center to accommodate undocumented immigrants or their families who were reluctant to enter the official site for fear of being discovered, and worked with Asociacion Tepeyac, a Hispanic immigrant advocacy and social services organization, to help undocumented workers produce necessary verifications of employment so that they could receive Red Cross and other benefits. And the Red Cross became the first national relief organization to include gay and lesbian families for survivor benefits.⁴

Problems for the American Red Cross began in the first week of November, when contributions reached nearly $550 million. The agency decided at this point that not all of these funds were needed for 9/11 purposes, and said that about half would be redirected into other projects and for future terrorist attacks. There were public outcries over this, because the Red Cross had been soliciting donations to the ostensibly stand-alone “Liberty Fund” for 9/11, even though the fine print said that, in keeping with customary policy, some portion of the funds might be set aside for future disasters. (This policy enabled the Red

⁴ Although the Red Cross and other private relief agencies offered aid to undocumented workers, in order to receive dislocated worker aid the workers had to show that they had in fact been employed. Some firms where they worked were totally destroyed. In other cases, employers were reluctant to verify their employment, for fear of being prosecuted for illegally employing persons lacking the required papers.

“The Red Cross were heroes from Day 1 to Day 21. They were disaster relief at its best. The Red Cross helped us make decisions we couldn’t have made without them.”

Cross to respond immediately to the September 11 attacks and when, on November 12, an American Airlines plane crashed in a Queens residential neighborhood shortly after take-off, destroying homes and killing over 250 people.)

In response to the ensuing firestorm of protest that donors had been misled, the American Red Cross reversed itself, and on November 14 announced in a news conference carried live by CNN that the entire Liberty Fund would be spent to care for the victims of the September 11 attacks, their families, and the rescue workers. The CEO, Bernadine Healy, was forced to resign and there were inquiries from key members of Congress about the agency's fundraising and distribution policies. In December, former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell was appointed by the Red Cross as the Independent Overseer for distribution of the $360 million then remaining in the Liberty Fund to benefit 9/11 victims and families.⁵

On January 31, 2002, the Red Cross announced its plans, developed under Mitchell's direction, to liberalize some of its programs and create new ones as vehicles for expenditure of the remaining funds. The Family Gift Program, which provided living expenses for families of the deceased or missing and persons seriously injured, regardless of financial need, was extended from three months to a full year. For the first time ever, the Red Cross made one-time outright gifts, without a showing of need, averaging about $45,000 per family, to the estates of the deceased and to the seriously injured. For the 3,300 families who were also in the Family Gift Program, this brought the average total Red Cross benefit to about $109,000. Further funds were allocated for needs-based assistance for displaced residents, economically affected persons, and disaster workers. And $80 million (later increased to $114 million as funds continued to be contributed) was set aside over a three- to five-year period for services such as health, mental health, and case management and service coordination.

Outcries about 9/11 relief prompted some apparently long overdue American Red Cross policy changes. For example, the Red Cross began releasing and posting on its Web site the quarterly funding allocations for 9/11 purposes, something it had never done. For the quarter that ended April 30, 2002, $398 million had been designated, on a non-needs basis, for victims' families and seriously injured persons; $310 million for needs-based financial assistance for displaced residents and those who lost their jobs; and $114 million for long-term services. Immediate relief had cost $105 million, and $40 million was budgeted for "Fund Stewardship." On June 6, 2002, the Red Cross announced changes in the language used in advertising, to clarify its practice of pooling donations for use in a wide range of emergencies, and stated it will ask donors to designate whether their gifts are for a specific occurrence or more general relief. The agency will also now formally tell donors when it has raised enough money to address a particular event.

September 11th Fund

The September 11th Fund utilized staff of its co-sponsoring organizations, the New York Community Trust and United Way of New York City, to develop distribution policies and guidelines. The Trust manages about 1,600 charitable funds and in 2001 made about 15,000 grants totaling $128 million. The United Way had raised about $139 million in its most recent campaign among businesses and their employees, and distributed these funds to some 400 member agencies working in areas such as youth development, job training, childcare, and health care. Drawing on this experience, Trust and United Way staff possessed an unmatched wealth of knowledge of the city's social service delivery structure in both the public and private sectors. Beginning in the week of the attack and continuing for several weeks, staff met with some 350 nonprofit social services agencies to ascertain needs as they became known, and to assess their capacities to take on additional work in the relief and recovery effort.

The resulting guidelines, manifesting a comprehensive approach to 9/11 relief and addressing the needs of a broad group of victims, were clearly stated:

- Funding will be available for “both short-term emergency needs as well as long-term needs.”
- Support will be given for the “socio-economic recovery of individuals, families, and communities”; for “the economic rebuilding of lower Manhattan and New York City”; and for bolstering “the capacity of nonprofits to continue to provide services.”
- Eligibility for assistance will include “ a) individuals and families victimized by the . . . disaster (loss of a family member or caregiver); and b) the larger community of individuals and families affected by the disaster.”
- Funding will be “coordinated with public and other private funds and targeted to unmet needs to avoid duplication of services.”
- Nonprofit organizations will be utilized as primary vehicles for providing services and cash made available through September 11th Fund resources.

The fund's first grant was announced September 18, $1.2 million for Safe Horizon, a nonprofit victim services and advocacy organization, to provide immediate financial assistance to meet housing, food, medical care, transportation, and burial expenses of victims and their families in New York City. Another early grant enabled Safe Horizon and Seedco to prepare and publish a resource guide of services and other assistance.

In mid-October, the Trust and United Way announced formation of an independent board to oversee the fund, chaired by Franklin Thomas, former president of the Ford Foundation. Joshua Gotbaum, who was named CEO, had held three high-level federal agency positions in the Clinton administration and before that was a partner and managing director of the investment bank Lazard Freres & Co. (Gotbaum is the son of long-time New York City labor leader Victor Gotbaum, who once ran the nation's largest municipal employees union.)

By June 30, 2002, the September 11th Fund had received $501 million and distributed $301 million in 250 grants to nonprofit organizations that provided cash and services to victims. More than 100,000 individuals received cash and services, including 3,800 families and other financial dependents of those who were killed or were severely injured, 35,000 people who lost their jobs, and 6,000 individuals and families who were displaced from their homes.

The largest share of the $301 million distributed as of June 30, 2002 was $128 million, the proceeds from a United Way-sponsored national telethon, that was awarded in the form of $10,000 payments to each family of a direct victim of the attacks in New York and Washington and the crash in Pennsylvania, and $2,500 for each displaced worker or resident below Canal Street in New York City. The next largest share of funds given out by the September 11th Fund, $94.2 million, went to Safe Horizon (described below), mostly for emergency financial assistance.

Other recipients of $1 million or more included Seedco; Nonprofit Finance Fund; Fund for the City of New York; NYU Downtown Hospital (for reimbursement for emergency care immediately after the attack); the New York City Partnership (for downtown small and medium-sized business retention); Consortium for Worker Education (for employment services); Legal Aid Society (for emergency civil legal assistance for low-wage workers in and near the World Trade Center); Renaissance Economic Development Corporation (for loans to Chinatown small businesses); and for the United Ways of Bergen and Monmouth counties in New Jersey, Westchester/Putnam County in New York, and the National Capital Area/DC (all for cash assistance and services to victims and their families, for which the United Ways charged no administrative costs).

Plans for the remaining $200 million of unallocated funds, announced July 11, 2002, and known as the Ongoing Recovery Program, included both new and expanded initiatives to seek to fill gaps in existing services available through government or other philanthropic sources. In the announcement, CEO Gotbaum said that the program “continues to help those who need it, but in a better way. In the emergency phase . . . the emphasis was on delivering help quickly. Now we are funding a program that meets a wider range of needs, that gives people choices about where and how to get help, and makes it easier for them to get it.” New activities included:

- up to $3,000 per person for mental health counseling for those who are not insured;
- employment services, including financial assistance for people in training, for an estimated 12,000 people including dislocated workers, regardless of immigration status, and surviving family members of those who died;

. . . the Ongoing Recovery Program included both new and expanded initiatives to seek to fill gaps in existing services. . . .

Its founders correctly sensed that the September 11th Fund would be operating in a fishbowl. . . . This “was going to have to be the most accountable charitable effort in history.”

- health insurance for an estimated 14,000 victims, mostly dislocated workers, who cannot afford private health insurance and are not eligible for public programs such as Medicaid or FHP;
- specialized assistance for an estimated 25,000 children in schools who were evacuated or directly witnessed the attack;
- service coordinators to help more than 10,000 people get help more easily.

In addition, it was stated that the fund would expand funding for previous services, including grants and loans for small businesses and nonprofit organizations in lower Manhattan; continued legal and financial advice on issues such as settling estates or applying to the federal September 11th Victim Compensation Fund; and continued cash assistance for those who were eligible but had not yet come forward, including surviving families, the injured, and displaced residents. A new component provided financing for small businesses at Reagan National Airport serving Washington, DC, which suffered losses as a result of sharply reduced operations for several weeks following 9/11. Board Chairman Franklin Thomas, in announcing the Ongoing Recovery Program, said, “The needs of those directly affected . . . are so great that alone we could not cover them all” and emphasized that government and other philanthropic entities also needed to address ongoing problems.⁶

Accountability and Donor Intent

Its founders correctly sensed that the September 11th Fund would be operating in a fishbowl on worldwide public view, and that funding decisions would be the subject of scrutiny from the media, social services agencies competing for funds, and affected individuals and families. Accordingly, as Gotbaum put it some months later, the fund determined that this “was going to have to be the most accountable charitable effort in history.” Gotbaum’s second hire was a communications officer, and he soon added two more.

Among some members of the media, public officials, and the general public, there was an apparent assumption that donors to the fund intended that their contributions would be distributed at once in the form of cash compensation and services to a narrow group of immediate victims and their families, to the exclusion of other affected groups such as displaced workers.⁷ Gotbaum found himself on the defensive, answering accusatory questions about why the funds had not been paid out to the people who were thought by many to have been the bona fide beneficiaries of the fund’s more than two million donors.

⁶ A survey of 1,139 victims by McKinsey & Company for the 9/11 United Services Group, released July 8, 2002, estimated that the total cost for the next year of meeting unmet needs for financial supplements, employment services, mental health, and other services would be about $768 million, the largest share of which, $700 million, was needed for workers whose livelihoods were affected by the attack. Of this $700 million, an estimated $562 million was needed to fill gaps in basic household expenses.

⁷ The September 21 national telethon sponsored by the United Way may have created some confusion on this point, since the networks, led by ABC, insisted that the audience be told that proceeds were earmarked for immediate victims and their families (even though there was no list of victims).

To gain reassurance on the important issue of donor intent, and to help in program planning, the fund conducted public opinion research through an online survey October 1 and a telephone survey a month later, including respondents who did and did not give to a 9/11-related cause, both in New York City and elsewhere. The results confirmed support for the fund's strategy of taking a broad view of who should be helped and the need for both cash assistance and services such as mental health counseling and job training. For example, in both surveys more than 80 percent of those polled agreed that the definition of victims should include people who were displaced from their homes or lost their jobs in the World Trade Center or Pentagon. (Both surveys were made possible by special in-kind corporate contributions.)

The September 11th Fund's Web site provided comprehensive information on all facets of the operation. Grants were announced monthly, including recipients, amounts, and purposes. Contributors were listed by the size category of their gifts. And there were nine pages of detailed answers to 41 FAQs on governance, how people could get help, what cash and services were available, and how private philanthropy differed from government funding. Perhaps inspired by this example, other philanthropies expanded their public information activities. Prior to 9/11, the Robin Hood Foundation in New York City, for example, posted only the names of its grantees, but information about its 9/11 relief fund included amounts granted and purposes of the grants.

UNIFORMED RESCUE WORKERS' FUNDS

The funds that solicited for the families of rescue officers, who gave their lives saving others, collectively received, next to the American Red Cross and the September 11th Fund, the third largest share of donations. Brief descriptions of these three major funds follow.

Twin Towers Fund

The largest of the uniformed rescue workers' funds, the Twin Towers Fund, was announced September 12 by Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. The first contributor was General Electric Company, with a $10 million gift, and by November the total reached $80 million. Giuliani named his deputy counsel, Larry Levy, as the operating head with pro bono assistance from Changing Our World, Inc., a New York-based philanthropic services firm. (Levy, who had previously served as special assistant corporation counsel to Mayors Ed Koch and David Dinkins in his decades-long New York City government service, also played a key role in the city's establishment of family assistance centers following the attack.) During the fall, Levy and his associates convened weekly meetings at City Hall with other uniformed personnel funds, including those established by the unions, to share information, address complex policy choices, and discuss plans for distributions.

The Twin Towers Fund faced difficult decisions, some of which were shared by other uniformed services funds, such as:

- whether to include the court officers and non-uniformed rescue personnel, such as Port Authority staff, who died in rescue efforts (they were included on a case-by-case determination);

More than 80 percent of those polled agreed that the definition of victims should include people who were displaced from their homes or lost their jobs. . . .

There also were issues to be resolved concerning the rightful recipient in complicated family situations such as divorce and domestic partners.

- whether to give the same amount to every family or to factor in the number of dependents, length of service, and the like (the formula took into account the number of children, with a distinction between those under and over twenty-three);
- whether to make payments to the families of single people (next of kin received about three quarters as much as the families of married persons);
- whether to observe the long-standing federal law limiting charitable payments only to those for whom financial need could be shown (Mayor Giuliani initially had implied that he would challenge the law if it was not changed);
- whether to pay out all the money in one installment or to reserve a portion to meet future needs of the families;
- whether to set aside funds to meet non-financial needs that would emerge later, such as trauma and grief counseling and family support services (provision was made for current and future non-financial needs).

There also were issues to be resolved concerning the rightful recipient in complicated family situations such as divorce and domestic partners. Generally the spouse was the Twin Towers Fund's beneficiary, and "registered domestic partners" were also eligible; difficult cases were reviewed in consultation with the fund's Family Advisory Board, consisting of members of the victims' families.

A final complication was that the Twin Towers Fund did not exist as a recognized charitable entity until its IRS tax exemption was received in December; the temporary repository of donations was Public-Private Initiatives, Inc. (PPI), a nonprofit established in 1994 by Mayor Giuliani for the incubation of new programs. After his term ended in January, 2002, Giuliani planned to carry on the work of the Twin Towers Fund as board chairman of the newly incorporated private nonprofit organization of the same name. The fire union and a few police families criticized this plan, in part because some felt that distributions had not been made rapidly enough and they did not want Giuliani to continue to control the donations.

In early 2002, the fund requested approval of the New York State Attorney General, who oversees tax-exempt charitable organizations, to transfer the fund's assets from PPI to the Twin Towers Fund. Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who had earlier clashed inconclusively with Giuliani over the question of which of the two officials was the appropriate person to coordinate philanthropic relief efforts, granted approval for the asset transfer in April on the condition that one-quarter of the Twin Towers Fund board members be appointees of the new mayor, Michael Bloomberg.

The fund made its initial distributions, totaling about $49 million, in November and December, 2001, and a second distribution, $3.5 million for non-uniformed personnel, in January. By June 6, 2002, the fund had made its third distribution, bringing the total to $155 million, with each surviving spouse having received $235,000 plus various amounts for surviving children. Next of kin where there was no spouse received $150,000.

The fund planned to utilize the balance for such things as college scholarships through the Citizens' Scholarship Foundation of America; summer camps with grief counselors; assistance for injured rescue workers; financial and emotional support counseling; and possible assistance for cases that were still under review. The fund distributed all of its resources and closed at the end of 2003.

9/11 Disaster Relief Fund of the International Association of Fire Fighters

This fund, the second largest among the rescue workers funds, was established by the AFL-CIO affiliated labor union representing more than 240,000 professional fire fighters and emergency medical personnel in the United States and Canada. According to George Burke of the union, 60-70 percent came from collections organized by local firehouses around the country. As late as June, 2002, donations were continuing to arrive at the rate of about $750,000 per month, according to IAFF chief of staff Michael J. Crouse.

The IAFF moved quickly to get an IRS Section 501(c)(3) tax exemption for the 9/11 Disaster Relief Fund, which was approved in early October, near-record time, and it acted speedily and decisively to make its distributions. Following the instructions of its general president, Harold Schaitberger, to "do it right and do it quick," the IAFF kept it simple: divide the total pool of dollars raised by the number of surviving families and give each family, including the families of single fire fighters, an equal amount. Payments were made in increments as funds continued to come in. Fire Department of New York official records were relied upon to determine who was the legitimate beneficiary.

The IAFF set aside about $4 million from the fund to establish a new program, the 9/11 Fire Fighters Counseling Fund, to provide grief and trauma counseling for families who lost a loved one. This fund also financed counseling for firefighters who suffered from guilt because they did not die. Crouse believed that it would be easier to attract firefighters and families into such a counseling program if it was done under the aegis of the FDNY and union than if it is offered through a regular employee assistance program, which carried the stigma of substance abuse counseling.

The IAFF, asserting its lack of jurisdiction, managed to remain out of the bitter public controversy over the distribution of funds to survivors by the Uniformed Firefighters Association of Greater New York (UFA), Local 94 of the IAFF, which raised about $70 million through its Widows' and Children's Fund. (The UFA's Widows' and Children's Fund is distinct from the New York Police and Fire Widows' and Children's Benefit Fund, described below.) Families of the 97 unmarried firemen who died September 11 said they were as entitled to a payment as the widows were, because the union's Web site advertising the fundraising appeal said that donations were for "the families of our fallen firefighters." However, the union by-laws provided that the donations were to "relieve the need of the widows, children and dependents. . . ." One of the mothers of a dead single fireman, Domenica Ragusa, was quoted in the May 12, 2002 New York Times, saying "My son is just as dead as a married man who is dead.” A full-page ad sponsored by the UFA in the May 19 Times defended the union’s position, and said that the dispute would be resolved “in consultation with the Charities Bureau of the New York State Attorney General’s Office.”

New York Police and Fire Widows’ and Children’s Benefit Fund

This fund was established in 1985 by Rusty Staub, the former New York Mets baseball star, to help the families of police and fire officers who die in the line of duty. The fund’s annual appeals raised less than $1 million until 1996, and its typical distributions have been one-time death benefits of $10,000 plus annual payments based on fundraising success. Until 9/11, the largest annual gift had been about $2,200 per year, according to Stephen J. Dannhauser, president of the fund and executive partner of the Manhattan law firm Weil, Gotshal and Manges.

Before 9/11 the fund had raised a total of about $52 million in its 16-year history, and since 9/11 it had raised more than twice that much, about $115 million as of July 1, 2002. Major contributors included Deutsche Bank, with $9 million in foregone stock trading commissions, and $8 million from the Starr Foundation. In all, there were over 100,000 gifts and Weil, Gotshal and Manges mobilized a group of volunteers that opened the mail, and acknowledged and booked the receipts.

Even though it was an established organization with guidelines, the fund faced two decisions about whom to help and how. One was whether to make payments to the families of Port Authority and EMS personnel; the fund decided to include them in its 9/11 distributions. The other question was about the pre-9/11 widows the fund had been assisting with payments since its beginning. The fund’s board felt that provisions should be made for these approximately 429 widows in the distribution of the new funds. To be certain that there would be no violation of donor intent for these steps broadening the beneficiary group, the fund wrote to each contributor of $5,000 or more and asked if they had a problem with the fund’s intentions. Only a few objected, in which cases the fund returned their gifts.

The fund made $100,000 payments to each 9/11 widow in two or three installments, and a special $30,000 gift for each pre-9/11 widow. In keeping with the fund’s traditional policy, beneficiaries of single persons received a $10,000 death benefit. In the cases of disputed beneficiaries, the fund relied on union records and union determinations of disputed cases. At the time, fund chief financial officer David Golush said that the fund expected to make a further payment of $18,000 to each 9/11 widow and $8,000 to each pre-9/11 widow in October. The approximately $62 million balance remaining after these payments were made would be escrowed for annual payments of $12,000 to approximately 729 widows (including both pre-9/11 and 9/11-related) over a seven-year period beginning in October 2003.

Before 9/11 the fund had raised a total of about $52 million in its 16-year history, and since 9/11 it had raised more than twice that much. . . .

SAFE HORIZON

Safe Horizon is a nonprofit victim assistance, advocacy, and violence prevention organization, the largest such agency in the country, and formerly known as Victim Services. For many years the agency has worked closely with the State of New York's Crime Victims Board in processing crime victims' compensation claims. By September 15, 2001, in response to a request by Governor George Pataki, Safe Horizon began serving as the Crime Victims Board's agent for writing checks for financial assistance for surviving spouses who lost their primary wage earners in the attack.

Because state guidelines limited this assistance to persons who were still married when their spouses died, Safe Horizon turned to the United Way of New York City to provide comparable funding for domestic partners, gay and lesbian couples, and others who did not meet the state's requirements. Lilliam Barrios-Paoli, then senior vice president and chief executive for agency services of the United Way of New York City, and one of the key planners for the September 11th fund, readily agreed. By the week following 9/11, Safe Horizon was the only agency issuing on-the-spot checks, for up to $1,500, to replace lost incomes.

After the attack, Safe Horizon was forced to vacate its downtown headquarters, at 2 Lafayette Street, and when staff returned ten days later, they were without phones, fax, or Internet until December. Despite these obstacles, and in the absence of formal agreements with funding organizations or existing procedures for handing out money, Safe Horizon moved quickly to provide cash and crisis counseling not only at the main Family Assistance Center but also at four other centers in the outer boroughs to facilitate access for people who were reluctant to come to downtown Manhattan. Safe Horizon also opened a toll-free twenty-four-hour hotline and, with Seedco and United Way, prepared and published in print form and online a directory of resources for victims and their families.

Safe Horizon CEO Gordon Campbell delegated to his frontline staff the authority to make decisions and hand-write checks even as procedures and forms were being designed. Calling it "managing by groping," Campbell credited his agency's performance — widely acknowledged as exemplary — to "knowing the victim business," relationships with state and city agencies, and the professionalism and dedication of the staff. Senior vice president Elizabeth McCarthy said that Safe Horizon was able to adapt flexibly to the extraordinary circumstances because it was an independent local organization, not bound by the rules of a national organization, as was the case with the local branches of the American Red Cross and Salvation Army.

As of March 31, 2002, Safe Horizon had received $90.3 million for 9/11 services, all but $2 million of which came from the September 11th Fund. (By June 17, Safe Horizon had received an additional $5.5 million from the September 11th Fund.) Of the $90.3 million, about 90 percent, or $80.8 million, was passed through in cash payments to 43,828 surviving family members, injured persons, and displaced residents and workers. The $9.5 million balance, about 10 percent of the total, was spent on operations costs such as staffing seven assistance centers, the September 11th hotline, and trauma education seminars.

Safe Horizon was able to adapt flexibly to the extraordinary circumstances because it was an independent local organization, not bound by the rules of a national organization. . . .

Criticism by Fox News' Bill O'Reilly . . . though overstated and inflammatory . . . had a basis in reality.

The $90.3 million total received for 9/11 is almost three times as great as the agency's annual budget of $34 million, but Safe Horizon managed to conduct 9/11 relief while not "missing a beat" with its regular clients, according to Campbell, because many dedicated staff members worked 12–16 hours/day, and their number was augmented by new staff and over a thousand volunteers.

Recognizing from experience that providing emergency cash to victims may succeed in relieving the immediate anxiety, but only open the door for the beginning of the more challenging long-term process of healing, recovery, and getting on with one's life, Safe Horizon continued to follow up all of its approximately 47,000 9/11 clients with phone calls from a twenty-five-person phone bank to see how they were faring and what further assistance they needed.

SERVICE COORDINATION

The problem is that one charity doesn't know what the other is doing. There is no central controlling authority. . . . Grieving people are forced to fill out dozens of forms and then left to fend for themselves. . . . This is one big cruel mess. The United States government can move a huge military machine half way around the world in two weeks — but can't supervise charities and get financial help to a few thousand devastated families in six weeks. Does this make sense to you?

This criticism by Fox News' Bill O'Reilly in his October 15, 2001, syndicated column, though overstated and inflammatory — and suggesting a new role for government to oversee philanthropic operations — had a basis in reality. Despite the fact that frontline staff at the Family Assistance Center on Pier 94 were, by most first-hand accounts, welcoming and eager to help, and the overall accommodations were a model for similar multi-service locations, there were problems.

People seeking aid had to fill out several different forms with mostly the same information. Some people were not well treated, and some did not get what they wanted. Some seeking aid had never asked for help from a government or nonprofit service organization, and were not accustomed to standing in line or answering personal questions. It is not difficult to find angry, grief-stricken, confused, and terrified people in the aftermath of a calamity who lash out at the closest target and tell their stories to a reporter, and New Yorkers are famously impatient and demanding.

There were enough well-publicized negative experiences to prompt two Congressional hearings in early November.⁸ Arizona Republican Congressman J. D. Hayworth called on the House Ways and Means Committee to assume an oversight role in the private philanthropic relief effort. Senator Charles Grassley (R-IA), ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, urged federal and state regulators "to work together to oversee the fair and expeditious distribution" of donations.

New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who regulates tax-exempt charitable organizations, called a September 26 meeting in his office with the large relief groups, including the Red Cross, Salvation Army, and others. Spitzer's section chief of the Charities Bureau, Marla Simpson, had been conferring extensively with key participants in the Oklahoma City response to the 1995 bombing of the Murrah Building, and believed that the coordination of agencies that had occurred in that city could be replicated among at least ten times that many, serving a much larger and more diverse population, in New York City.

At the September 26 meeting, Spitzer proposed that his office establish a central database of everyone who sought assistance from the major service providers, as a means of ensuring fairness in the distribution of funds and services, and to prevent duplication and fraud. According to Spitzer during an interview in June, 2002, all of the participants agreed this was a sound idea, but the next day, apparently on orders from national headquarters, the American Red Cross of Greater New York office said that confidentiality rules prevented it from disclosing information about its clients. The question of a central database was therefore unresolved, but the Office of the Attorney General posted on its Web site a list of organizations and services for people and organizations affected by the disaster.

Leaders of charitable service organizations recognized the validity of appeals for greater coordination, but felt that the Office of the Attorney General should not be the one to do it, because of a concern that information might be used in connection with the attorney general's oversight and regulatory responsibility. The two top officials of the September 11th Fund, board chairman Franklin Thomas and CEO Joshua Gotbaum, met with Spitzer in mid-October, 2001, and told him this. Rather, they argued, the charities should be responsible for their own coordination, and Spitzer agreed. Gotbaum said in a June 2002 interview that, after this meeting, Spitzer urged the major charitable service providers to organize themselves. Gotbaum then offered to fund the effort. This was the origin of the 9/11 United Services Group, which is described later in this report.⁹

Spitzer urged the major charitable service providers to organize themselves. Gotbaum then offered to fund the effort. This was the origin of the 9/11 United Services Group. . . .

⁸ Similar problems, though much less emotionally charged, occurred for businesses and nonprofit organizations seeking aid to recover from the attacks' impacts. Several different nonprofit financial institutions and government agencies offered aid to small businesses downtown and in Chinatown, often with different geographic and other eligibility requirements. Programs whose northern boundary was Canal Street excluded the approximately two-thirds of Chinatown's small garment manufacturers with large numbers of low-wage workers. (This problem was addressed by the September 11th Fund.) Two nonprofit organizations, the Fund for the City of New York and the Nonprofit Finance Fund, received separate grants from the Ford Foundation and the September 11th Fund to provide similar assistance to nonprofit organizations that suffered similar impacts.

⁹ Tragically, communications failures were not limited to the charitable sector. It has been widely reported, for example, that better communication and coordination between the CIA and FBI might conceivably have averted the attacks. An in-depth investigation by the New York Times, published July 7, 2002, concluded that throughout the September 11 crisis "the two largest emergency departments, Police and Fire, barely spoke to coordinate strategy or to share intelligence about building conditions," and found that firefighters' radio systems did not function and were not linked to those of the Police Department. "The city's Office of Emergency Management, which was created by Mayor Giuliani in 1996 and had spent nearly $25 million to coordinate emergency responses," according to the Times, "had not conducted an emergency exercise [in the World Trade Center] that included the Fire Department, the police, and the Port Authority emergency staff."

A main stumbling block to sharing information among relief organizations was their confidentiality policies.

Although there was no central registry of applicants, the three major relief agencies at the Family Assistance Center — the Red Cross, Salvation Army, and Safe Horizon — had quickly developed ad hoc coordinating procedures that simplified life for persons seeking aid. Staff of Safe Horizon, the first stop for visitors to the center, offered to escort their clients to the desks of the Red Cross and Salvation Army and provide some of the necessary basic information required to initiate registration with those organizations. By January, 2002, the agencies had developed what amounted to a one-stop process: staff were cross-trained so that a representative of one could take down the information required for all three, and later do the work of filling out the separate forms.

A main stumbling block to sharing information among relief organizations was their confidentiality policies. The Red Cross, for example, said that it had had some bad experiences giving out the names of fire victims forced from their homes, whose vulnerability then became known to estranged, abusive spouses. The Salvation Army said that their confidentiality policies were designed to protect people who are concerned that the assistance they receive will be reported as taxable income, and to protect undocumented workers, who fear that government authorities might have access to the information and initiate deportation proceedings.

The Red Cross, Salvation Army, and Safe Horizon allowed their clients to waive their confidentiality, but Safe Horizon appears to have been more adroit than the others in interpreting the waiver in the context of the situation, to the benefit of its clients. Safe Horizon explained the advantages of information sharing in terms of saving time and trouble, and facilitating access to additional services. It also made clear that the information would be shared only with other service providers.

9/11 United Services Group

The 9/11 USG was launched December 14, 2001, with much fanfare. Its core financing came from the September 11th Fund, in fulfillment of Gotbaum's pledge to help the leading charities develop their own solutions to coordination of their work and thus avoid possible intervention by Attorney General Spitzer. The 9/11 USG was described as a "consortium of 13 New York City human services organizations . . . to coordinate the help being provided to those affected by the World Trade Center terrorist attacks and ensure that their needs are efficiently and compassionately met." Member agencies were the American Red Cross (which had changed its mind and agreed to cooperate, with confidentiality issues to be worked out later); Asian American Federation of New York; Black Agency Executives, Inc.; Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of New York; Catholic Charities Diocese of Brooklyn; Federation of Protestant Welfare Agencies, Inc.; Hispanic Federation; Human Services Council; Mental Health Association of New York City, Inc.; Safe Horizon; Salvation Army; UJA-Federation of New York; and United Neighborhood Houses of New York. The 9/11 USG's budget was approximately $3 million, of which more than half was said by a 9/11 USG official to be in the form of donated services from IBM, Warburg Pincus, ADP, McKinsey & Company, and others.

The 9/11 USG compiled a central database of individuals affected by the attacks who had received services from one or more of the member organizations. One purpose of this was to prevent duplication of services and “double dipping” on financial benefits. Another purpose was to provide victims with periodic notification of new programs and services, such as the $200 million Ongoing Recovery Program that had been announced by the September 11th Fund.

Another 9/11 USG program was training for “service coordinators” in its approximately 25 member and affiliated organizations to be able to direct clients to the full array of 9/11-related services. The 9/11 USG also continued to operate the Safe Horizon September 11th 24-hour hotline, and to maintain a database of resources built on the directory developed soon after the attacks by Safe Horizon, United Way, and Seedco with funding from the New York Community Trust and United Way of New York City through the September 11th Fund.

Persons involved in New York’s social service community, who were close to the 9/11 relief effort and were interviewed for this report, evince perfunctory support for the 9/11 USG, and say that the effort may have been too little, too late. It failed to reach most of the medium- and smaller-sized community based organizations, although steps were being taken to remedy this shortcoming. As one 9/11 USG Board member said in an interview, “A database is a good thing, but it doesn’t make coordination and collaboration happen.” However, the value of 9/11 USG may become apparent in the future if the collaboration serves as a model for future catastrophes and develops a common intake process that can be activated immediately.

In debriefings about the reports’ findings and implications for future disasters with philanthropic groups and individuals in New York and other cities, it became clear that attempts to improve planning for post-disaster responses needed to include attention not only to philanthropy, but also government programs. Philanthropy does not operate in a vacuum, but rather seeks to find niches that relieve the burdens of government, fill gaps, or test and evaluate new approaches to meeting human needs. The following sections attempt to place philanthropic programs in this larger context through a closer look at the scope, coverage, and difficulties of government programs in 9/11 relief and recovery in New York City.

SUMMARY OF FEDERAL AID

Federal aid for disasters is triggered by a presidential declaration, requested by the governor, of a disaster area. Federal funds are allocated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, with the approval of the Office of Management and Budget, for a wide variety of purposes pursuant to the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act of 1974. Most of these funds flow through the state emergency management agency to state and local public agencies. FEMA is the lead federal agency for the response, and is “authorized to enter into agreements with the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief or disaster assistance organizations” for coordination of activities.

The value of 9/11 USG may become apparent in the future if the collaboration serves as a model for future catastrophes. . . .

Federal 9/11-related aid for New York City from all sources totaled about $25 billion, ten times as great as the total philanthropic amount for all locations and individuals.

In addition to FEMA's statutory assistance programs, Congress frequently appropriates additional funds through other federal agencies to cover needs not met by FEMA's authorizations. Examples in the 9/11 response were the community development block grant program, for business recovery and other purposes, through the Department of Housing and Urban Development; funds for health screening and reimbursements for hospitals through the Department of Health and Human Services; tax incentives for new investments in New York City's downtown district through the Internal Revenue Service; and dislocated worker training through the Department of Labor.

Federal 9/11-related aid for New York City from all sources totaled about $25 billion, ten times as great as the total philanthropic amount for all locations and individuals. Initially, President Bush requested from Congress a special $20 billion appropriation to fight the war on terrorism in Afghanistan and elsewhere. New York Senators Schumer and Clinton demanded that there also be an equal amount for relief, recovery, and rebuilding in New York City, and Bush committed to this amount in an Oval Office announcement attended by the two senators on September 13. The $40 billion emergency supplemental appropriations bill, introduced September 14, was enacted as Public Law 107-38 on September 18.

There was no delineation of uses of the funds except that one-half was for domestic relief and recovery. Of the total $40 billion, the president was granted authority to expend the first $10 billion; the next $10 billion was to be available only after fifteen days' advance notice on proposed uses to the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations; and the final $20 billion could be obligated "only when enacted in a subsequent emergency appropriations bill." In subsequent negotiations about the uses of funds, Congressional conservatives sought to undermine the commitment, and OMB director Mitchell Daniels made negative comments about it, but the president stood by his pledge, and all of the funds were appropriated with designated uses.

The appropriations act watered down Bush's commitment to New York by providing that "not less than one-half of the $40 billion shall be for disaster recovery activities and assistance related to the terrorist acts in New York, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. . . ." Nevertheless, the president repeatedly referred to $20 billion for New York City, and the OMB, in internal documents, periodically updated the "Status of President's $20 Billion Commitment to New York." It was estimated that an additional $5 billion would be distributed by the federal September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, established in a later piece of legislation.

In an early 2003 interview about the process by which Congress and the administration decided on specific programs to be funded with the $20 billion, a member of Senator Schumer's staff at the time recalled Otto von Bismarck's quip, that the two things one does not want to see being made are laws and sausages. The process was greatly complicated because the Hart Senate Office Building was closed for the three months following arrival of a letter containing anthrax in Senator Daschle's office October 15. New York's senators and their staffs — as well as others normally housed there — worked out of temporary offices, often without computers, in other parts of Capitol Hill.

In the then Democratic-controlled upper house, Senators Schumer and Clinton were the initiators and arbiters of numerous funding requests urged by private firms, government agencies, and nonprofit organizations active in relief and recovery. Thus, like much of the philanthropic response, large amounts of funds were made available before planning had occurred, and negotiations about specific uses of appropriated but unspent funds took place. For example, the New York Times reported on February 7, 2003, that the administration had agreed, following intense negotiations, to a precedent-breaking understanding that would permit New York State and City to use about $980 million of the $20 billion in emergency relief funds to help close budget deficits.

Of the $25 billion (including the estimated $5 billion for the Victim Compensation Fund), about $6.8¹⁰ billion was directed at the broad categories of human, economic, and social needs that also received philanthropic contributions, and it is this portion that is the focus of this report. The balance, furnished mainly through FEMA, covered major expenditures such as debris removal, emergency transportation, DNA testing, transportation and other physical infrastructure replacements, insurance for contractors working at ground zero, and reimbursements to New York City Fire and Police Departments for various costs such as death benefits, overtime, and replacement of destroyed government facilities and equipment. As one FEMA official put it in commenting on the agency's problems with its individual assistance programs, "FEMA's big role is to help governments, not people, recover." The $25 billion figure also included about $5 billion in tax incentives for corporations to reinvest in lower Manhattan.

Excluding the estimated $5 billion in victim compensation, federal aid totaled about $1.8 billion for human, social, and economic purposes. About 60 percent of this was for small business loans and loss compensation grants, and the balance went for all other programs including mortgage and rental assistance, home repairs, temporary lodgings, individual and family grants, disaster unemployment assistance, trauma counseling, employment assistance, health screening and registry, and reimbursement of hospital expenses. The largest categories of non-business aid were health/mental health and needs-based financial assistance, each accounting for about 18 percent of the total.

Private philanthropy provided roughly the same total amount. Exclusive of victim compensation payments, $1.8 billion was spent for individual, family, and community needs by philanthropic organizations.¹¹ Human services programs and needs-based financial assistance were the largest categories of the $1.8 billion, each accounting for roughly 30–35 percent.

¹¹ The main sources for these estimates of philanthropic contributions and distributions were the Foundation Center, Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11, November 2002; various issues of The Chronicle of Philanthropy; the AAFRC Trust for Philanthropy, Giving USA: 2002: The Annual Report on Philanthropy for the Year 2001, Center on Philanthropy at Indiana University, Indianapolis, 2002; and Ford Fessenden, "After the World Gave: Where $2 Billion in Kindness Ended Up," the New York Times, November 18, 2002.

Family Assistance Center (New York City)

The Mayor's Community Assistance Unit, the City's Office of Emergency Management, the City Human Resources Administration (HRA), with FEMA assistance, opened, on September 17, a Family Assistance Center as a one-stop facility where family members who had lost someone could file a missing persons report, begin the process of obtaining death certificates, and receive other help. Anne Grunewald, director of human services for the City's Office of Emergency Management, credited FEMA as having been "tremendous in supporting us quickly" in opening the Family Assistance Center (FAC).

Human Resources Administration personnel installed phone lines and computers, and deployed staff to process emergency food stamps, Medicaid, and up to $1,500 for emergency child care. HRA's lead official, Jane Corbett, deputy commissioner for domestic violence and emergency intervention services, had coordinated the City's response to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and the fatal 1981 fire that claimed eighty-seven lives at the Happyland Social Club in the Bronx. She persuaded top HRA management to support the concept of a one-stop center and obtained the unusual authority to issue checks in amounts of $200-$400, on the spot and with no documentation, to tide people over until other benefit streams could be activated. The Social Security Administration, Veterans Administration, and State Workers Compensation Board also opened desks to serve their statutory beneficiaries.

Major nonprofit organizations represented at FAC included the American Red Cross, Salvation Army, New York Cares, and Safe Horizon. Safe Horizon also opened offices for this purpose in the outer boroughs, for the convenience of individuals who were unable or frightened to travel into Manhattan. Representatives of the Crime Victims Board issued checks on the spot for up to $1,500 to cover loss of earnings of deceased family members (with a maximum payment of $30,000 per year), and in the other boroughs Safe Horizon issued checks in the expectation of subsequent reimbursement by the Crime Victims Board. Documentation of eligibility was expedited at the time of application and completed later. The September 11th Fund awarded Safe Horizon a grant to pay comparable death benefits for same-sex partners, and to families whose primary wage earner had not died but had lost his or her job.

It gradually became clear that the disaster had wide impacts that extended well beyond the deaths and injuries at ground zero. Most significantly, about 100,000 jobs had been lost, devastating individuals and families who lived throughout the city and region. Others whose livelihoods depended on doing business with downtown companies, such as car service drivers, also suffered economic losses. These people began streaming into FAC, which had been intended to help only those who were family members of an immediate victim.

In response to this unexpected outpouring of people with diverse needs, HRA on September 19 opened a Disaster Assistance Service Center (DASC), initially to serve displaced workers with the participation of the State Department of Labor, at 180 Water Street, but which soon became a much larger operation than the Family Assistance Center.

The DASC's mission was expanded to include other services provided by agencies such as HUD and the Small Business Administration, and moved to 51 Chambers Street; the DASC relocated again to 141 Worth Street, in headquarters that were organized by FEMA. A portion of the FAC at Pier 94 was also converted to a DASC. Some thirty public and private agencies ultimately were represented at these one-stop centers.

There were no protocols or precedents for such collaboration and the agencies needed to improvise procedures to mesh their operations and facilitate the process for clients. Agencies were concerned that some people would try to take advantage of the crisis and get benefits they were not entitled to. Privacy rules prevented some organizations, especially public agencies but also the Red Cross, from sharing information about clients. As a result, DASC experienced well-publicized cases of frustrated and anguished individuals who had to provide the same information on different forms for several agencies, of people who did not get straight answers to their questions, and cases of delays or denials of benefits.

An ad hoc system of coordination began to emerge from the work of an informal "services coordination group," consisting of the top leadership of key organizations, chaired by FEMA, that could make decisions and empower DASC personnel to carry them out. The group sorted out which agencies were responsible for various services and configured a flow of clients through the different stops. The group developed a single information form to capture basic information needed by each agency for every client — such as family size, how they were impacted, and social security number — and this information was shared among the agencies, reducing the amount of time clients needed to spend on this task. IBM donated personnel to digitize the form, using techniques developed in earthquake disasters in Turkey, India, and Peru. Some of the agencies, including HRA, began recording on the form the benefits they disbursed. These arrangements were made too late to save time or trouble for many of the first wave of clients, but they became the groundwork for the 9/11 United Services Group, described earlier, which by early 2002 had developed an online unified case management system for the broadly defined group of victims and their families.

Cash Benefits for Families of Immediate Victims

The largest single federal assistance program for individuals and families was the unprecedented September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, providing tax-free cash awards for the survivors of persons killed or seriously injured in the attacks who agreed to waive their right to sue the airlines or any other public or private entity (except alleged foreign terrorists or their supporters). The fund was established by Title IV of the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act of 2001, commonly referred to as the airlines bailout bill, hastily enacted by Congress eleven days after 9/11. The payments were intended to compensate surviving dependents for the expected future economic value of the victim's life, based on their current earnings. This formula generated larger payments for well-to-do victims than for those at the lower ends of the earnings scale, an imbalance not corrected by charitable awards. Awards from the fund were expected ultimately to reach about $5 billion, for approximately 3,200 eligible claimants, including nationals of 61 different countries.

To prevent “double dipping,” the authorizing legislation specified that awards from the fund be reduced by “all collateral sources” of payments such as life insurance, pension funds, and payments by federal, state, and local governments (except the federal Public Safety Officers Benefit). Fund Special Master Kenneth Feinberg initially interpreted the statute to mean that charitable payments, such as those made by various benefit funds, were to be counted as collateral sources. In the November 2001 meeting with Feinberg, representatives of about fifty philanthropic organizations had threatened to withhold their payments until after the Victim Compensation Fund made its awards, so as to prevent reductions in the federal amounts. Recognizing the potential for unacceptable delays, Feinberg decided to exempt charitable payments from the collateral sources calculation. As a result of this decision, some families received cash awards from numerous sources including the Red Cross, uniformed officers benefit funds, and the federal fund.

Philanthropic Victim Compensation

Victim compensation for families of persons who died or were seriously injured at one of the three disaster sites, without regard to financial need, was by far the largest category of philanthropic aid, accounting for more than $800 million. The largest single source was the American Red Cross, which reported disbursing $316 million for these purposes as of January 31, 2003. The Red Cross had never made such gifts, having previously confined its financial assistance to temporary living expenses for needy victims. The new program was created as part of the response to widespread public controversy over the Red Cross’ announcement that it would not spend all of the 9/11-inspired Liberty Fund contributions on that disaster. When the Red Cross reversed this policy, it was forced to find new ways to spend the contributions, and the outright gift program was the largest of these inventions.

The three major funds dedicated to the 436 families of deceased uniformed rescue workers raised about $455 million, mainly for payments to survivor families, by late 2002. Smaller amounts were distributed as outright gifts to families of immediate victims by other charities, principally the September 11th Fund and the Robin Hood Foundation. Corporations that lost large numbers of employees in the World Trade Center also established their own charitable funds for cash payments to surviving family members. Three firms that suffered about one-third of the total deaths — Marsh & McLennan, Cantor Fitzgerald, and Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, Inc. — contributed and raised from their employees and others a total of about $30 million.

Operations of these funds were marked by ad hoc decision-making, because most of the funds were newly created and lacked policies, criteria, and procedures. These had been hastily created to enable expeditious action in the face of media stories highlighting the gap between total funds donated and totals paid out. Each fund used a different formula for its distributions. In some cases, there was a flat amount per family, while in others the number of dependents, length of service, and other factors were taken into account. Most families received support from more than one fund, with no coordination of benefits paid.

The various public and private cash compensation programs were extraordinary in comparison with those made following previous acts of terrorism, such as the bombings of the World Trade Center in 1993, the Oklahoma City Murrah Building in 1995, and the U.S. embassies in Africa in 1998. In none of these cases, nor in natural disasters, has Congress or philanthropy made such generous provisions for survivors. In striking contrast, the Department of Veterans Affairs has a standard schedule of benefits for surviving spouses and dependent children of active duty military personnel who die in the line of duty. This provides a spouse with two children under eighteen a life insurance benefit of $250,000 plus $1,422 per month. Dependents of military personnel killed on 9/11 were eligible for the Victim Compensation Fund, but the awards were reduced by the “collateral” payments from the VA.

Problems and Policy Issues

Despite their unmatched liberality, all of the funds encountered bitter criticism from the beneficiaries who complained that the formulas were flawed in one respect or another. Some uniformed rescue workers’ families who received a flat amount protested that those with more dependents and length of service should receive higher awards. Families of seven victims at Cantor Fitzgerald Securities filed a federal lawsuit against the Special Master of the federal Victim Compensation Fund, alleging, among other things, that his calculations shortchanged higher income earners by offering them only about ten percent of what they believe their spouses would have earned over the rest of their lifetimes.

The March 15, 2003 New York Times reported that there had been some 1,700 disaster-related suits against the City, including 1,000 firefighters seeking a total of at least $12 billion. The City Law Department set up a special World Trade Center defense unit consisting of twenty-one lawyers, operating on a $3 million budget, to fight these claims, which could take years to decide.

Aid for Small Businesses

The New York City Partnership and Chamber of Commerce reported that 707 small businesses were destroyed at the World Trade Center, and that in the forty-five days after 9/11 the losses at 3,400 inaccessible small firms in the immediate vicinity of ground zero amounted to $795 million. Small businesses as far as two miles from ground zero that experienced no physical damage nevertheless felt secondary impacts from disrupted subway service, utility repairs, closed streets, and a drop in tourism. Retail and food businesses, whose main market is foot traffic from office buildings, and small manufacturers, were especially hard-hit. By one estimate, there were about 14,000 small firms with fifty or fewer employees in Lower Manhattan and Chinatown south of Canal Street. These employed a total of about 370,000 people, including large numbers of low-wage and immigrant workers.

The second largest category of federal aid, totaling an estimated allocation of about $1.1 billion as of mid-2002, went for grants and low-interest loans for these enterprises. Federal and philanthropic funds were used to compensate for lost revenues, replace or repair damaged facilities or equipment, bridge insurance payments, and provide cash flow for recovery. About $700 million of the $1.1 billion in federal aid, mostly for grants for business loss compensation, came from outside an established channel of authorized federal disaster relief, through the community development block grant (CDBG) program created in 1974 to revitalize low-income neighborhoods. About $400 million was for loans under the FEMA-Small Business Administration's statutory disaster relief authorizations. Philanthropic organizations such as the Ford Foundation, the New York Times Company Foundation, the September 11th Fund, and other foundations and corporations made grants and low-interest loans to help support similar activities administered by nonprofit organizations.

Federal emergency supplemental CDBG appropriations for New York City economic recovery went to two quasi-independent state agencies, Empire State Development and its subsidiary, the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation (LMDC). Specific plans for expending the funds were subject to prior HUD approval. As in the case of natural disasters, the HUD Secretary waived many requirements of the CDBG program, such as the one that at least 70 percent of the beneficiaries be low- or moderate-income persons. Of the $3.5 billion total CDBG funding for the City — more than the total CDBG funds provided nationwide for all major disasters since 1991 — Congress required that at least $500 million be used to compensate small businesses and nonprofit organizations located in lower Manhattan for their economic losses. LMDC indicated that it planned to provide an additional $200 million for these purposes. The approximately $2.8 billion balance was used for downtown relocation and retention incentives for large firms, downtown residential relocation incentives, rebuilding Con Ed and Verizon facilities, master planning of the World Trade Center site, and various city expenses related to the emergency.

Business Recovery Grants

This program, the largest one to be funded with CDBG allocations, was designed by LMDC and Empire State Development to provide businesses or nonprofit organizations with fewer than 500 employees, located south of 14th Street, with cash grants for uncompensated economic losses related to the attacks. The closer a business was to ground zero, the greater the amounts that were compensated. The maximum grant, for businesses closest to the World Trade Center site, covered 25 days of lost revenue, up to $300,000. As of March 18, 2003, a spokesman for Empire State Development said that the agency had approved 14,233 grants totaling $530 million in business recovery grants. In a November 2002 study, the U.S. General Accounting Office (since renamed the Government Accountability Office) reported that about three quarters of the recipients employed 10 or fewer people, making it likely that a majority of the recipients employed a predominantly low-wage workforce.

Small Firm Attraction and Retention Grants

This LMDC/Empire State small business program was designed to provide cash grant incentives for small businesses that agreed to remain in or relocate to lower Manhattan. The program offers payments to businesses (but not nonprofits) with fewer than 200 employees that were located or were planning to locate south of Canal Street, and signed a new lease or renewed an existing lease for at least five years. Total payments were $3,500 per employee, except for those that were in the “Restricted Zone” close to ground zero, which could qualify for $5,000 per employee. As of September 11, 2002, $12 million had been disbursed to 246 businesses. According to Empire State Development’s plan for its CDBG funds, a total of $105 million was earmarked for the small firm attraction and retention program.

Business Recovery Loan Program

Another initiative of Empire State Development, also undertaken with CDBG funds, provided low-interest recovery loans for small businesses and nonprofit organizations that could not qualify for a conventional or SBA loan. This activity was directed at business revitalization, not compensation for losses or incentives for relocation, and firms that participated in one of the earlier programs were also eligible for this one. Businesses with 500 or fewer employees, located anywhere in the city provided they were south of 14th Street on 9/11, were eligible. Firms located beyond these boundaries on 9/11 qualified if they derived at least ten percent of their revenues from business south of 14th Street. Empire State funded the program with $50 million in grants to nonprofit community development financial institutions (CDFIs), which in turn awarded the funds as low-interest loans. Empire State expected that the CDFIs would make a total of about 1,000 loans averaging $50,000, with a cap of $250,000 per loan. Seedco, a CDFI which had been operating a small business loan and grant program with funding from several public and philanthropic donors, was the first recipient of Empire State funds under this new initiative, and had closed about forty loans worth about $2 million as of January 2003.

Assistance by State and City before Approval of Federal CDBG Funds

Shortly after the attacks and before approval of the CDBG funds, Empire State Development and the City Economic Development Corporation began a program of cash grants of up to $10,000 each to small businesses, and about $24 million was approved for 4,322 firms. The state and city also operated a joint program in which they furnished loan loss reserves to banks and nongovernmental community development financial institutions that extended bridge loans to small businesses and nonprofit organizations. The estimated $24 million in cash grants was expected to be reimbursed from CDBG funds, and the loan loss reserve program was funded with $15 million in CDBG resources.

Another initiative of Empire State Development . . . provided low-interest recovery loans for small businesses and nonprofit organizations that could not qualify for a conventional or SBA loan.

Problems and Policy Issues

Empire State Development’s small business programs received a great deal of criticism, including concerns about reimbursement grants that fell substantially short of actual losses, delays in approving and disbursing funds, confusion about boundaries demarcating eligibility for different programs and differing grant sizes, and perceived inequities such as the fact that businesses in the World Trade Center that were totally destroyed received the same amount as other businesses in the same geographic zone. The November 2002 GAO report found that the state had awarded only about one-half of the number of business recovery grants it originally estimated, but by March 2003 about three-quarters of the original target of 19,600 small businesses had been helped. The median amount of loss coverage not otherwise reimbursed by insurance or other grants was only about 17 percent. Because this was not an established disaster relief program, guidelines and criteria had to be improvised hastily to meet the emergency. As a result, according to an April 10, 2003 New York Times report, a HUD audit found that Empire State had “paid millions of dollars to companies without getting details on how they had calculated their losses, a flaw that persisted despite a preliminary audit that flagged the problems.”

Criticisms by business owners of the attraction and retention grant program focused on slow disbursements, ineligibility of firms with fewer than ten employees (a rule that was later eliminated), and disputes about the significance of lease expiration dates for businesses that were located in the World Trade Center. Another concern was that business grants were subject to federal income taxes, even though this was self-defeating of the purpose of the program’s assistance; grants to individuals for personal expenses like housing were not taxable. Some business owners were pleased with the assistance they received, and, according to officials of public and nonprofit organizations active in downtown economic assistance, some owners devoted a great deal of time and energy to making the rounds of various funding sources seeking to get the maximum possible aid.

Questions also were raised about the overall allocation of the $3.5 billion in CDBG funds. Large companies that remained or relocated in downtown could receive up to $6,250 per employee, compared to a maximum of $5,000 for small firms. A total of $170 million was allocated for the large firm retention program, compared to $105 million for small firms. Two firms that had quickly expressed an intention to stay downtown, American Express and the American Stock Exchange, were early recipients of these grants. The residential relocation incentive program, for which about $280 million in CDBG funds was allocated, provided residents of Battery Park City and parts of Tribeca, where the median household income was about $125,000, with grants of up to $14,500 if they signed new leases. Residents of Chinatown — where there was no direct damage but large economic disruptions — qualified for residential incentive grants of up to only $7,750, even though the Chinatown median household income was about a third of that in Battery Park City and Tribeca.

The state and city . . . furnished loan loss reserves to banks and nongovernmental community development financial institutions that extended bridge loans to small businesses and nonprofit organizations.

Small Business Administration Loans

The Small Business Administration (SBA) is equipped with statutory authority to make disaster-related loans in three categories: business physical disaster loans for repair or replacement of property; economic injury disaster loans for working capital to assist small businesses and nonprofit organizations cover operating expenses; and disaster assistance loans for repair or replacement of homeowners' or renters' real and personal property. Prospective borrowers from SBA were strongly encouraged first to register and establish their eligibility with FEMA, in a common intake procedure. Business owners who did not qualify for one of the SBA programs could be eligible for one of FEMA's individual assistance programs. Congress appropriated $175 million to the Small Business Administration as part of the $40 billion emergency supplemental bill, a figure that was calculated to support about $651 million in loans through the agency's three programs.

SBA loan officers were out stationed in the Disaster Assistance Recovery Center (DASC) at 141 Worth Street, and at one time at nineteen other locations including one in Chinatown. Eligibility was open to any small business that sustained physical or economic damage in any borough of New York City, ten suburban New York counties, six upstate New York Counties, six northern New Jersey counties, two counties each in Connecticut and Pennsylvania, and Berkshire County in Massachusetts. In addition, Congress authorized $75 million to enable the SBA to guarantee $4.5 billion in non-disaster-related "7(A)" bank loans for small businesses located anywhere in the country that could show a direct or indirect adverse impact from 9/11.

The SBA disaster loan programs carried interest rates of 3.375 to 8 percent, and could be for a term as long as 30 years. SBA loans were relatively straightforward and free of most of the intricate complexities of the Empire State grant programs, and could be for much greater amounts — up to $10 million, compared with $300,000 in Empire State's business recovery grants and $250,000 in recovery loans. (The maximum SBA loan in other disasters has been $1.5 million.)

All of SBA's assistance is in the form of loans secured by collateral, a requirement that could be waived or negotiated flexibly in the Empire State and CDFI loan programs because the source of these funds was mainly grants. Downtown business real or personal property that was destroyed or severely damaged was obviously not available as collateral. Instead, these owners usually needed to offer their homes as collateral, a very risky move when facing great uncertainties about the economic future of the city and their businesses. Undocumented immigrants were not eligible for SBA loans, but some Empire State/CDFI programs were less exacting than the SBA in their immigrant status documentation requirements.

Prospective borrowers from SBA were strongly encouraged first to register and establish their eligibility with FEMA, in a common intake procedure.

Criticisms of the SBA program focused on the collateral requirements and high denial rates.

SBA applicants could also qualify for all three of the Empire State programs and the CDFI programs, and in practice receipt of a grant or wage subsidy strengthened the cash flow projections analyzed in the loan underwriting process. Under program rules, owners were not prevented from borrowing from more than one source, although the ability to service total debt was a key underwriting factor.

As of January 4, 2003, SBA had approved $411 million for 11,165 disaster loans in New York City, about 85 percent of which were in Manhattan. Another $54 million had been approved for the suburban and upstate counties in the broader tri-state disaster area. There are no figures available on utilization of the expanded 7(A) guarantee program anywhere in the U.S., but SBA officials indicated that there had been very little interest. Of the $411 million in New York City, just over 90 percent was for economic injury loans for working capital and operating expenses in the disaster period. Eight percent was for repair or replacement of real estate, machinery, equipment, inventory, and supplies. Only $5.9 million had been approved for loans to homeowners or renters to repair or replace real estate or personal property. The $411 million represented about two-thirds of the authorized $651 million. SBA closed its DASC office and stopped processing applications January 31, 2003, upon expiration of the disaster period.

Criticisms of the SBA program focused on the collateral requirements and high denial rates. A November 2002 GAO study found that denials and withdrawn applications accounted for 54 percent of all business application dispositions, and the primary reasons for denial were “no repayment ability” and “unsatisfactory credit.” The primary reasons for withdrawals were “no IRS record found” and “failure to furnish additional information.”

Non-governmental CDFI Programs

Several nonprofit community development financial institutions began operating small business loan, grant, and wage subsidy programs soon after 9/11, initially with philanthropic support that reached a total of about $50 million. Seedco is the largest of these, having committed about $21 million as of January 31, 2003, mostly for retail and manufacturing enterprises employing less than fifty people south of Canal Street including Chinatown.¹² Retail and manufacturing businesses with less than fifty employees were more likely to employ predominantly low-wage and immigrant workforces than larger businesses and businesses engaged in professional services or other industries. Until it received Empire State Development grant, whose purpose is business recovery, Seedco’s programs focused on stopgap bolstering of small businesses’ cash flows and stabilizing their low-wage workforces until larger, longer-range assistance could be identified.

Other CDFIs and nonprofit organizations with similar programs for small businesses and nonprofit organizations in lower Manhattan included the Renaissance Economic Development Corporation, affiliated with Asian Americans for Equality; ACCION; the New York City Partnership and Chamber of Commerce; the Nonprofit Finance Fund; and the Fund for the City of New York. Each of these carved out a mostly distinctive niche, although there was some overlap in terms of eligibility, purposes, and uses of funds among CDFIs, Empire State, and SBA programs. CDFIs provided useful though small supplements to Empire State and SBA programs and were able to respond to very small businesses that for one reason or another could not qualify for, or did not receive, as much as they felt they needed from, a government program.

FEMA Individual Assistance Programs

At the time of its response to 9/11, FEMA had statutory authorization for three principal programs to assist individuals and families meet their economic needs following a disaster: Mortgage and Rental Assistance, Individual and Family Grants, and Disaster Unemployment Assistance. These are discussed in the following sections. As is the case with all other government programs — with the important exception of the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund — undocumented immigrants and most of those who arrived after August 1996 were not eligible. These individuals became a special concern of philanthropic organizations.

Mortgage and Rental Assistance

The Mortgage and Rental Assistance Program (MRA) authorizes FEMA to cover up to eighteen months of rent or mortgage payments for victims who suffer financial hardship as a result of a major disaster. FEMA's initial policy in New York City was to restrict eligibility narrowly to persons who could demonstrate a "direct" link between physical damage to their place of employment and the loss of at least 29 percent of their monthly gross income. Applicants also needed to produce a written eviction, dispossession, or mortgage foreclosure document. FEMA application forms contained no guidance or criteria for interpretation of "direct," and 15,000 faulty applications were mailed out that increased the risk that eligible families would not receive help.

There were numerous cases of administrative ineptness, such as denial because FEMA staff could not obtain employer verification of a job loss at a destroyed firm in the World Trade Center. Application evaluators — two-thirds of whom were temporary workers — were located in Texas, Virginia, and elsewhere, and many did not understand New York's geography. One employee, for example, did not know that 1 Liberty Plaza was located in downtown Manhattan, adjacent to the World Trade Center site. Another insisted that garment workers, many of whom had lost their Chinatown-based jobs because of transportation closures, had been laid off because it is a seasonal occupation. There were frequent descriptions of evaluators as condescending or rude.

FEMA made minor adjustments in its process and criteria at various times in late 2001 through early 2002, but never clarified what it meant by "direct." Among the changes was that a late notice would be acceptable documentation of intent to foreclose or evict. The adjustments did not improve the situation much, and the application denial rate six months after 9/11 was 70 percent. Only 2,854 applications were approved, for a total amount of $13 million. FEMA officials sought to deflect attention away from its shortcomings by making public statements, with some justification if not sensitivity, that the large charitable response helped New Yorkers stay current with their mortgage and rental obligations, thus preventing issuance of foreclosure or eviction notices.

FEMA officials struggling with the “direct effect” issue were troubled by how wide the eligibility area might become, and how large the outlays would be, if the direct connection to physical damage near the disaster site was no longer the criterion. Larry Zensinger, director of FEMA’s Recovery Division, continued to defend the initial eligibility criteria in a January 8, 2003 interview, noting “once you get away from a connection with direct physical impact, where do you draw the line? Airline employees living in Los Angeles also suffered economic hardship due to reduced flight schedules.”

In April and May 2002, FEMA reviewed all 7,323 denied applications and found about 22 percent to be eligible, and additional documentation was requested for a further 43 percent. But the need to prove undefined “direct” impact continued to be the main stumbling block. By June 2002, under the threat of pending Congressional legislation establishing eligibility boundaries and discarding the “direct” language, FEMA issued revised guidelines expanding the geographic area to include the entire Borough of Manhattan. (Taking no chances, Congress subsequently enacted this into law on August 2.) FEMA also discontinued requiring self-employed or business-owner applicants to apply for an SBA loan before seeking continued mortgage and rental assistance. Under the new rules, applicants could demonstrate economic impact by showing that:

- their employers were located in Manhattan and suffered financially because of the World Trade Center attack, or
- they lost jobs or significant income because their non-Manhattan employers had significant business relationships with firms in Manhattan, or
- they lived in Manhattan but commuted to work outside the borough and suffered financially because of travel restrictions after 9/11.

The standard of financial hardship was also decreased from 29 to 25 percent of gross monthly income. As a result of the new guidelines, and application deadlines that were extended several times, ultimately to January 31, 2003, the rate of eligible applications and amounts awarded increased dramatically. The number of eligible applications increased from 2,854 applications for a total amount of $13 million in April, to 10,429 and $87.7 million by December 26, 2002, a month before the deadline. The overall approval rate increased from 20 to 60 percent over this same period.

For all of its troubles, the Mortgage and Rental Assistance program provided much more help to New York City than it had in all other disasters since its inception. The program was little used before 9/11 because, according to a FEMA Inspector General’s Report in December 2002, “previous disasters did not coincide with nor result in widespread unemployment and national economic losses.” Before 9/11, a total of $18.1 million had been awarded for sixty-eight declared disasters, compared with $87.7 million for New York, with further monthly amounts yet to be paid out to those who could demonstrate continued economic need.

The MRA program had operated at such a low level that, in 2000, Congress made it unavailable for disasters after May 1, 2002. The Individual and Family Grants program was also repealed for disasters after May 1, 2002. For disasters occurring after that date, items previously covered by these two programs were combined in a new Individual and Households Program. The FEMA Inspector General's Report concludes its discussion of the MRA by saying that the program "if reinstated . . . would still require legislative revision to make it less complicated to administer. A broader, more flexible program . . . would more appropriately meet the range of economic losses experienced such as with the September 11 terrorist attacks. FEMA should explore such a program with Congress." Based on interviews with current and former high-ranking FEMA and other federal government officials, there were no indications that such an exploration was a priority for FEMA, which has now been incorporated in the new Department of Homeland Security.

Individual and Family Grants

This program provides grants to states, subject to a 25 percent matching requirement, as a sort of "ultimate safety net" to help meet disaster victims' various needs that cannot be addressed under other federal programs. Eligible expenses include compensation for such losses as vehicles and other personal property, moving and storage expenses, and medical, dental, and funeral costs. To qualify for the Individual and Family Grants (IFG) program, individuals must first have utilized insurance receipts and applied for and been denied an SBA disaster assistance loan for homes and personal property. In New York, the IFG program is administered by the State Department of Labor in accordance with a FEMA-approved plan.

The IFG program was marked by widespread complaints about confusing rules, excessive documentation requirements, delays in processing applications, high rejection rates, small awards, and poor public outreach and communications. About 300 people who mailed in applications had their packets returned in November 2002 because FEMA's Albany Post Office Box was closed after the agency failed for three months to renew the $425 annual fee. In response to criticisms, FEMA and the state extended the IFG application deadline on several occasions, finally to January 31, 2003. Items normally covered by IFG in other disasters, such as burial expenses and health care coverage, were not provided in New York City because the disaster was caused by a crime, and consequently these expenses were reimbursable under the U.S. Department of Justice's Office for Victims of Crime programs. FEMA officials also said that private charitable organizations were helping to meet these expenses.

The state Labor Department initially assigned ten permanent and 50 temporary employees to answer inquiries and process applications — utilizing a paper-based information management and case-processing system — in the Disaster Assistance Service Center at 141 Worth Street in lower Manhattan. The antiquated paper-based methodology led to an overwhelming backlog when, in May 2002, in response to heightened concerns about environmental contamination, the state and FEMA announced that the Individual and Family Grants program could be used to reimburse up to $1,550 in outlays for indoor air conditioner units and other air quality equipment for residents anywhere in the five boroughs, regardless of income or proof of adverse environmental impact. This was instituted despite the fact that EPA had concluded the city's outside air quality was back to where it was pre-9/11, and made use of apartments above 78th Street as clean control samples when testing for downtown air quality.

Indoor air quality equipment such as filters, air purifiers, and high-efficiency particulate air vacuum cleaners had been reimbursable since October 2001, but the May 2002 announcement that air conditioners were included engendered an entrepreneurial response by existing and start-up businesses that began promoting the program by encouraging individuals to purchase the equipment and seek reimbursement. Consumer uptake caused IFG applications to quadruple from about 3,000 per month to an average of about 12,000 in the unusually hot summer months of 2002. Not anticipating the upsurge, the state in March had reduced the number of staff assigned to IFG from sixty to thirty.

FEMA assigned a team of 150 employees to help the state reduce the backlog by converting data to an electronic database, referring new incoming calls to the FEMA national processing center, making on-the-spot eligibility determinations where possible, providing online registration in the DASC, and streamlining redundant processing procedures. FEMA and the state grossly overstated the consequent improvements, saying in late October 2002 that the approval rate had jumped from 13 percent to 89 percent. In responding to Congressional questions about "Enron accounting," a spokesman for the state Labor Department conceded that the new calculations did not represent real awards made, but rather the possibility that awards would be forthcoming. "It's more of a positive way of looking at where those people stand," the spokesman was quoted as saying in the November 1 New York Times.

As of December 24, 2002, about a month before the IFG application deadline, there had been 211,305 applications, of which 46,610 were approved, with awards totaling $46.8 million, or an average of just over $10,000 per grant.

Disaster Unemployment Assistance

The smallest of FEMA's individual assistance programs is unemployment assistance, primarily for self-employed workers such as car service drivers and others not covered by regular unemployment insurance, who are unemployed as "a direct result" of a disaster. As in the case of other public programs, undocumented immigrants, and most documented immigrants who arrived in this country after August 22, 1996, were not eligible. All of the DUA program costs were paid by FEMA, through a transfer to the U.S. Department of Labor, which in turn makes the funds available to the state Department of Labor pursuant to an approved plan and guidelines. The state processed applications in the Disaster Assistance Service Center.

The state acted quickly to get clarification from the U.S. Department of Labor about the interpretation of “direct,” which had never been defined in previous disasters. An October 12, 2001 letter, subsequently confirmed in the November 14 Federal Register, went into great detail defining the term in restrictive language limiting eligibility to unemployment resulting from “physical damage or destruction of the work site,” “the physical inaccessibility of the work site,” and loss of work in a business that “previously received at least a majority of its revenue or income” from businesses that suffered the specified direct impacts. The regulation ruled out unemployment that was “the result of a longer chain of events precipitated or exacerbated by the major disaster.” Although FEMA didn’t use these words, the same thoughts were in the minds of its officials who resisted expanding the boundaries of the Mortgage and Rental Assistance Program.

Minimum DUA benefits are one-half of the average regular unemployment weekly benefit, which in New York worked out to be $138 per week. The actual benefits paid were based on earnings, and in New York the average was about $183/week. Awards are reduced by any Workmen’s Compensation or Social Security payments. DUA benefits are customarily paid for up to 26 weeks of disaster-related unemployment, but in New York the period was extended to thirty-nine weeks thanks to special legislation introduced by the New York State Congressional delegation. The deadline for applying for benefits was extended several times, ultimately until June 2002. According to FEMA figures as of the week ending November 29, 2002, a total of 3,290 claims had been approved, a 49 percent approval rate, and $13.2 million in benefits had been paid.

Crisis Counseling

FEMA’s largest individual assistance program following the 9/11 disasters was its one hundred percent funded grants to New York State for the Crisis Counseling Assistance and Training Program (CCP), administered by the state’s Office of Mental Health with technical support from the federal Center for Mental Health Services. Known as Project Liberty, the program offered community outreach, education, group counseling, referrals and short-term interventions for disaster-related distress, including bereavement counseling and cognitive-behavioral counseling such as teaching skills for managing anxiety and coping with stress. Project Liberty services were delivered by 68 public and private nonprofit agencies at over one hundred locations, with multicultural staffs possessing fluency in more than two dozen languages.

The CCP is traditionally limited to the state where the disaster occurred, but in the case of 9/11 New York State requested, and FEMA agreed, that residents of New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania also be eligible. Project Liberty services were available to any person who lived in or visited these areas during the disaster. The program was extensively promoted through publication of an 800 number, extensive advertising with the de-stigmatizing “Feel Free to Feel Better” slogan, and TV and radio public service announcements from celebrities such as Joe Torre and Susan Sarandon.

FEMA’s unemployment assistance program is primarily for self-employed workers . . . not covered by regular unemployment insurance, who are unemployed as “a direct result” of a disaster.

Longer-term mental health services, as well as financial support, and related social services for crime victims, are made possible by funding from the federal Department of Justice's Office for Victims of Crime. . . .

In August 2002 the state received FEMA approval to expand the scope and range of services beyond short-term interventions, to assist individuals “who continue to experience trauma symptoms at levels resulting in substantial function impairment.” This permitted the addition of treatment for post traumatic stress disorders, depression, and anxiety, but there were still restrictions on provision of medication, hospitalization, and long-term therapy. The CCP program customarily operates for nine months following a grant award, which would have been the end of 2002, but in the New York area the deadline was extended to December 31, 2003.

Longer-term mental health services, as well as financial support, and related social services for crime victims, are made possible by funding from the federal Department of Justice's Office for Victims of Crime (OVC) through one hundred percent grants to state agencies. In New York, these resources were provided to the State Crime Victims Board, which contracts with public and private nonprofit agencies to furnish the services to eligible victims. Many agencies, such as Safe Horizon, one of the largest nonprofit crime victims' organizations in the nation, received funding from both the CVB and Project Liberty to deliver services. FEMA's Project Liberty grants could be used only for outreach-based, short-term counseling (with the recent liberalizations noted above), but CVB funds can be used for services for up to four years and can reimburse third-party providers.

FEMA reported that, as of December 24, 2002, about $165 million had been approved for Project Liberty in New York and the four other states — by far the largest such grant in the 27-year history of the program and almost as much as had been awarded in all previous disasters combined. However, only about $65 million had actually been obligated, and figures were not available on numbers of people served. Foundations and other philanthropic organizations also made major commitments to provide for longer term therapy and other needs not covered by FEMA. The September 11th Fund allocated some $45-$55 million for mental health benefits up to $3,000 for an estimated 15,000 people, as a supplement to existing health insurance or payment for treatment for those who do not have coverage. The New York Times Company Foundation's 9/11 Neediest Cases Fund played a leadership role in elevating awareness of mental health impacts, especially among children, and made grants of more than $5 million in this area, chiefly to help with training and capacity-building of providers.

Recommendations for FEMA

The FEMA Inspector General, in a December 2002 report, FEMA's Delivery of Individual Assistance Programs: New York — September 11, 2001, concluded with issues “requiring FEMA's attention.” The most significant of these, in relation to the subjects covered in this report, were that FEMA:

- examine how to address individual economic loss;
- develop “fair and equitable eligibility criteria . . . and . . . not appear arbitrary”;
- reach “diverse ethnic populations in dense urban areas”;

- recognize “the hardships of extremely low-income populations”;
- broaden its outreach capability regarding non-English speaking victims;
- pursue “legislative changes that would exempt FEMA’s [individual and household assistance] programs from the Federal public benefit classification when victims . . . are lawfully present . . . but may not have the qualified alien status required by Title IV of the [welfare reform act] of 1996.”;
- simplify documentation requirements;
- be “flexible in defining the time period” for assistance;
- work with states to “ensure that the State contingency staffing plans can adapt to fluctuations in applicant activity”;
- be “better able to anticipate the proactive role non-governmental organizations will play . . . and attempt to coordinate relationships with these organizations.”

These recommendations seem highly appealing, but some may conflict with others. For example, application of fair and equitable procedures in a transparent fashion may not always be consistent with an attempt to be flexible.

Disaster Relief Medicaid

The City’s Medicaid agency could not follow the usual procedures for enrolling or recertifying Medicaid recipients through the state’s Medicaid computer system because of telecommunications failures following 9/11. To deal with this crisis, Governor Pataki received a special waiver from the federal Medicaid agency that permitted a greatly streamlined application process. The Disaster Relief Medicaid (DRM) program, providing emergency four-month coverage, also put into effect the new Family Health Plus plan, a Medicaid expansion that was scheduled to be implemented in the fall of 2001 but was delayed as a result of the disaster. This new program allowed for higher income eligibility limits than before (from 87 to 133 percent of the federal poverty level for families), and dispensed with asset tests.

As reported in the November 14, 2002 Wall Street Journal, “fraud prevention took a back seat to getting help for needy people.” The application form was trimmed from eight pages to one; interviews took only about fifteen minutes rather than the traditional two or three separate three-hour sessions; applicants could qualify by verifying only their identity rather than having to produce reams of material; Medicaid workers made decisions on the spot at one of twenty-two community-based centers and coverage began immediately; and eligibility was broadened to include legal immigrants regardless of their date of entry in the U.S., as contrasted with the previous rule, enacted in the 1996 welfare reform law, that they had to have been in this country before August 22, 1996. Aggressive community outreach,

The FEMA Inspector General [recommended] that FEMA be “better able to anticipate the proactive role non-governmental organizations play . . . and attempt to coordinate relationships with these organizations.”

The Disaster Relief Medicaid program succeeded in enrolling nearly 350,000 people in four months, about ten times the usual volume for the same amount of time.

media publicity, training Medicaid providers, and program assessment were made possible through grants from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, the United Hospital Fund of New York, and the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Results

The DRM program succeeded in enrolling nearly 350,000 people in four months, about ten times the usual volume for the same amount of time. Preliminary research by the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured, released in August 2002, found that enrollees made “heavy use” of preventive services such as check-ups and mammograms, as well as surgery, dental visits, prescriptions, and eye examinations. When emergency coverage began to expire, beginning January 31, 2002, DRM enrollees needed to complete a full application, provide the usual documentation, and appear for a personal interview at a regular Medicaid office. In the early stages of the transition, only about half of the DRM enrollees appeared for the recertification interview, a finding whose significance researchers sought to understand. Possible explanations included mistaken beliefs that the emergency coverage was still in effect, inability to read the HRA letter calling them in for an interview, undeliverable letters, or that fraud was committed in the DRM application and the beneficiaries feared discovery.

Protection of taxpayers and philanthropic donors from fraud was a dominant element in government and philanthropic programs. The concluding sentence in an article about the DRM by Kathryn Haslanger of the United Hospital Fund of New York raises the important caution, not just for disaster relief but also more generally, that “fidelity to program integrity must do a better job so that procedures to screen out the ineligible do not exclude large numbers of eligibles.”

Air Pollution

Destruction of the World Trade Center and severe damage to surrounding buildings caused release of such great quantities of debris, dust, and smoke that people in the area in the immediate aftermath of the event spoke of it as having been like night. There was concern about the extent to which exposure to these materials would cause health effects. EPA began air sampling in lower Manhattan and downwind locations, Brooklyn and Jersey City, with funding supplied by FEMA. EPA also oversaw removal of hazardous materials from the “Pile” at ground zero, cleaned up dust that had accumulated up to several inches thick on downtown streets, and cleaned the exteriors of about 200 buildings. It also established a network of about 20 monitors downtown and in adjacent areas to measure airborne dust particles and other contaminants released as a result of the burning and collapse of the World Trade Center.

By late 2002, EPA issued a report finding that air contaminants in Lower Manhattan were “less likely to cause cancer and other long-term health problems than many had feared,” as reported in a December 24 article in the New York Times. The study found that most people living or working in the area around ground zero were “unlikely to suffer serious short- or long-term health effects . . . [but] anyone exposed in the early hours was at risk of chronic sickness, as many firefighters have already reported.”

Despite these generally sanguine findings, many were still concerned about potential dangers. In response to intense pressure from residents and elected officials, EPA announced in May 2002 that it would, for the first time ever, carry out indoor clean-up, testing, and environmental remediation for any resident south of Canal Street who requested it. Through private contractors hired by the city’s Department of Environmental Protection, the cleaning included all hard surfaces, rugs, carpets, curtains, drapes, upholstered furnishings, air conditioner units, exterior balconies and terraces, exterior window ledges, and window guards. Contractors sought building owners’ permission to clean common areas, vacant apartments, and central HVAC systems. Following the cleaning, DEP/EPA contractors tested for asbestos in all residences, and for dioxins and twenty-three elements in a sample of about 250 homes, and followed up when unacceptable levels were found. Residents were promised that they would receive test results within four to six weeks. Commercial properties were not included in the EPA program, which referred business owners to the SBA for loans for these purposes.

Using city-furnished census data, EPA estimated there were 20,000–30,000 eligible residences. As of January 21, 2003, Mary Mears of EPA estimated that about 6,700 units had been cleaned, but was unable to furnish any information about costs.

Health Monitoring

The Environmental Protection Agency may have felt that there was little remaining danger, but community and occupational health professionals following rescue workers exposed to contamination after 9/11 were not so sure. In late January 2003, Dr. Stephen M. Levin of Mount Sinai Medical Center announced initial results from his team’s clinical work-ups of some 3,500 ground zero workers, made possible with $12 million in federal funding through one of the emergency supplemental appropriations bills enacted in 2002 to help fulfill President Bush’s $20 billion pledge. As reported in the January 31 New York Times, Dr. Levin found that, of a sample of 250 examinations, three-fourths still had respiratory problems ten months after the attack, half had lung-related complaints, and half were experiencing psychological trauma warranting further review. It was estimated that as many as 35,000 workers and volunteers spent time at or adjacent to ground zero in the days following September 11. Senator Clinton pushed strongly for additional federal appropriations, up to a total of $90 million, to support continuation of Dr. Levin’s work. Philanthropic contributions to health monitoring were made by the September 11th Fund.

Other studies turned up similarly troubling findings. A Centers for Disease Control telephone survey of a sample of Manhattan residents five to nine weeks following September 11, found that among the 13 percent of adults with asthma, 27 percent reported more severe asthma symptoms after the attack. In an October 17, 2002 Forum on World Trade Center health effects, the director of the NYU-National Institute of Protection of taxpayers and philanthropic donors from fraud was a dominant element in government and philanthropic programs.

The New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene created a registry for long-term tracking ... of the health status of the ... people who lived or worked near the World Trade Center

Environmental Health Sciences Center reported that “premature declarations of ‘safety’ were in contrast to the ‘World Trade Center Cough’ experience of many people in lower Manhattan,” and that “this increased both distrust of government and the public’s concerns about health risks.”

World Trade Center Registry

The New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene created a registry for long-term tracking and monitoring of the health status of the estimated 100,000–200,000 people who lived or worked near the World Trade Center site between September 11, 2001 and June 30, 2002. The registry, similar to one that was compiled following the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, uses periodic surveys to measure short- and long-term health and mental health effects of exposures to the attacks and ensuing smoke, dust, and airborne substances. The registry seeks to identify patterns of illness and pinpoint their origins, evaluate possible risks, and provide prevention and public health policy information to all New Yorkers and others who were affected. Dr. Pauline Thomas, assistant commissioner of the bureau of surveillance of the City Health Department, believes that the comprehensive registry is an essential means of establishing whether clinical reports of high incidences of certain conditions among small samples were reflective of “background” health conditions of a large population. Dr. Thomas also believes that such a study is necessary as a means of resolving “lingering anxiety” among the public.

The registry was expected to begin in the spring of 2003, and ideally would continue until 2021 if sufficient funding is made available. The initial $20 million was provided by FEMA to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, whose Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, an environmental public health group, was working with the City Health Department on the registry. Officials emphasized that the registry will not include medical diagnoses or clinical examinations, but people who say in the interviews that they are still sick would be provided with referrals, including referrals to Project Liberty for respondents experiencing emotional or other mental health problems.

Employment Services

Federal aid to help individuals cope with disasters focuses on short-term relief. Disaster Unemployment Assistance is no exception, since it provides minimal benefits for a short period of time until people can find new jobs. Adjustments to permanent changes in the labor market are not addressed as part of disaster response. Accordingly, employment services to help people improve their skills or find new jobs is an overlooked subject in the standard federal disaster response programs.

The Consortium for Worker Education (CWE), a nonprofit organization sponsored by the New York City Central Labor Council and its forty-six affiliated unions, gained a special $32.5 million appropriation in one of the emergency supplemental appropriations bills introduced to fulfill the president’s $20 billion commitment. With this funding, CWE created an Emergency Employment Clearinghouse to assist some of the “80,000 workers

... displaced by the World Trade Center attacks either directly or indirectly” through such services as job placement assistance, career advancement counseling and referrals, and education and training to teach new skills. The Center was also supported by philanthropic organizations, including the September 11th Fund, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the McCormick Tribune Foundation, whose grant was designated to help undocumented workers gain new or improved skills. The September 11th Fund also allocated more than $50 million for other employment training programs, including payment of stipends for trainees.

The Consortium for Worker Education entered into agreements with some 160 firms that committed to a program of job retention, rehiring, and new hires. For some of these firms, CWE subsidized approximately one-half the wages, for periods up to ninety days, for jobs that paid no more than $25/hour, with a maximum subsidy of $100,000 per company.

WHAT HAS BEEN LEARNED

The purpose of this study has been to increase public understanding of lessons learned in the overall government-philanthropic relief effort, suggest a framework for preparation for future similar events, and highlight unresolved public policy issues arising from the 9/11 experience. The nation was tragically unprepared for the worst attacks on U.S. soil by a foreign enemy since the War of 1812. As a result, governmental, private, and philanthropic organizations were forced to create, in the midst of turmoil and grief, new procedures to respond to the disaster. Despite widespread public and media criticism pointing out one shortcoming or another, this effort was in fact remarkably successful overall. Funds provided by both the federal government and philanthropic entities far surpassed the amounts in any previous disaster, and the allocations for some government aid programs exceeded the totals distributed for all previous disasters combined. Moreover, in numerous instances government agencies and philanthropic organizations demonstrated unaccustomed flexibility, agility, and speed in assisting individuals, families, small businesses, and nonprofit organizations.

Following is a brief summary of lessons learned in this experience.

- Human suffering was alleviated by the rapid and creative philanthropic responses that in many cases preceded significant similar aid by the lead federal disaster agency.
- Conventional philanthropic planning and decision-making processes must be streamlined and made very flexible in responding to fast-moving emergency circumstances.
- Philanthropic speed and flexibility are not necessarily attended by widespread fraud.
- Cash gifts can ease anxieties about financial needs, but no formula for distributing this assistance will be greeted by universal acceptance or solve complex problems of loss, stress, or unemployment.
- Because of the real possibility of future terrorist attacks on cities, FEMA should prepare for large-scale urban calamities by expanding its current capacity to deal with individual and family needs traditionally geared to natural disasters in sparsely populated areas.

Human suffering was alleviated by the rapid and creative philanthropic responses that in many cases preceded significant similar aid by the lead federal disaster agency.

The long-term recovery process was aided by the fact that some philanthropic organizations reserved funds for later use to meet individual, family, and community needs. . . .

- Changes in federal law lifting the limitations on charitable payments to the financially needy, and establishment of the federal September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, may have distorted the public perception of the role of philanthropy by creating an expectation that its purpose is to provide financial compensation for lost life.
- The long-term recovery process was aided by the fact that some philanthropic organizations reserved funds for later use to meet individual, family, and community needs whose exact dimensions were not immediately apparent in the chaotic weeks following 9/11.
- New York City and the metropolitan area benefited from the controversial decisions of some foundations to direct 9/11-related resources to shoring up nonprofit organizations including arts and culture groups.
- Even with many agencies' work over many months, there remain uncounted thousands who did not receive adequate assistance.
- The major relief agencies need to continue and make permanent their work in developing a simplified one-stop application process in preparation for use in another disaster.
- Questions about donor intent in emergency fundraising can be avoided by unambiguous appeals and, if questions arise, can be addressed by polling donors and the general public at various times after the emergency.
- In a future event of this magnitude, the major philanthropies should expand their efforts to provide frequent in-depth media briefings on their activities.

Public Policy

The lead federal disaster agency, FEMA, is better equipped to deal with the aftermath of natural disasters, such as floods in rural areas, than it is to work in complex urban settings. It is more effective in providing aid to state and local government than to individuals and families. FEMA's individual and family assistance programs failed to help many people who needed them, or provided help only after extensive delays and, finally, Congressional action. FEMA guidelines contemplate replacement of physical loss, not compensation for economic setbacks like those experienced by thousands of jobless New Yorkers. FEMA's requirement that individuals demonstrate that their job was eliminated as a "direct" result of the attacks failed to recognize widespread economic impacts throughout the region, and caused thousands of needy people to go without financial assistance for their mortgage and rental payments. FEMA's Inspector General's report of December 2002 contains numerous recommendations for remedying many of these shortcomings, including the need to address economic losses, development of "fair and equitable eligibility criteria," and the importance of reaching "diverse ethnic populations in dense urban areas."

Some recovery needs are not addressed in the authorizing statutes for federal disaster relief programs, and special Congressional action and philanthropic organizations filled the gaps. Chief among these were employment training and readjustment, financial assistance for very small businesses with inadequate collateral for SBA loans, indoor cleaning and environmental remediation, and health monitoring and treatment. The ad hoc approach has provided needed relief to many people and businesses, but in the process engendered confusion about eligibility criteria and procedures and diminished the credibility of government. It was unclear in these and other areas where the responsibility of government ended and that of philanthropy began, or where individuals and organizations or their insurance policies were responsible for their own recovery. The federal government needs to decide whether to create new programs with defined criteria to meet these needs in future disasters.

Perhaps the most important philosophical and public policy issue arising from the response to 9/11 has to do with the concept of compensation of surviving families for the death of a loved one. By far the largest share of government and philanthropic aid distributed for humanitarian purposes — about $5.8 billion of a total $8.6 billion — was for this use. An unprecedented federal September 11th Victim Compensation Fund was established for 9/11 survivors, but families of victims of other terrorist disasters, such as the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, were not included. Philanthropic organizations distributed an estimated $800 million to the approximately 3,200 families of people who died or were seriously injured in the attacks in New York City, Washington, D.C., and Shanksville, Pennsylvania. Much of this occurred because of intense media pressure insisting that this was the intention of donors to various relief funds. To facilitate the distributions, Congress did away with the long-standing criterion of financial need for receipt of charitable donations. This has created an impression that one of the purposes of philanthropy is to compensate for lost life. Congress and the philanthropic sector need to decide if this concept will be a precedent for philanthropic responses to future disasters.

To address these and related policy issues, Congress should consider creating and funding a Disaster Relief and Recovery Commission with leadership representation from philanthropy, business, the media, and federal, state, and local government, to clarify the disaster-related relief and recovery responsibilities of government, philanthropy, insurance, and individuals.

The commission could draw upon the substantial body of relevant investigation and research done in the aftermath of the September 11th emergency, examining problems identified, good practices described and recommendations made in the GAO reports on charitable performance and small business assistance programs; the FEMA Inspector General's report; the two Ford Foundation/Thomas Edison State College reports; Foundation Center reports; the Stanford Graduate School of Business case study of the September 11th Fund; the United Way of New York City's report on the September 11th Fund; the LBG Associates report on corporate responses to disaster relief; and the Century Foundation report on media coverage of the philanthropic response.

Problems and policy issues discussed in this report have received scant systematic attention from policymakers. This is unfortunate, because they bear on our preparedness for future similar events and affect public confidence in government and philanthropy. They raise important questions about:

Some recovery needs are not addressed in the authorizing statutes for federal disaster relief programs, and special Congressional action and philanthropic organizations filled the gaps.

SEPTEMBER 11: THE PHILANTHROPIC RESPONSE

Problems and policy issues discussed in this report have received scant systematic attention from policymakers.

- the extent of federal responsibility to restore communities, individuals, and families to their pre-disaster state;
- the role of philanthropy vis-à-vis government at all levels;
- coordination of effort;
- the purposes and criteria for financial aid for individuals and businesses; and
- the operations of important government and charitable institutions.

Recommendations

The report's four major recommendations are:

1. Encourage major cities to draw up coordinated contingency plans.

In anticipation of future similar attacks, major urban areas might do well to develop a contingency plan and locations for one-stop service centers, including a list of agencies and services, a protocol for uniform intake, a system for digitizing and sharing information, and provisions for coordinated case management. Such measures would save time and maximize assistance for grief-stricken and traumatized individuals.

2. Establish a federal commission.

The U.S. Congress should consider creating and funding a Disaster Relief and Recovery Commission with leadership representation from philanthropy, business, the media, and federal, state, and local government. The commission's charge would be to:

- clarify the disaster-related relief and recovery responsibilities of government, philanthropy, insurance, and individuals, with attention to filling key gaps;
- review and refine the purposes and procedures of existing federal programs and suggest new elements and changes in existing elements to improve efficiency and responsiveness;
- establish principles about financial awards for individuals and businesses, including taxation of recovery grants to businesses, with special attention to eligibility of immigrants for government disaster relief assistance;
- assume responsibility for implementing the GAO's recommendation that FEMA convene a working group of government and philanthropic leaders to develop better means of philanthropic coordination.

3. Encourage philanthropy to clarify charitable appeals.

The philanthropic sector needs to consider questions that arose about the intentions of donors to 9/11 relief funds. Charities soliciting from the general public need to meet two conflicting challenges. Their appeals should be specific enough to tell the potential donor how the funds will be used, but broad enough to permit flexibility to respond to needs as they become known. Charitable funds that plan to assist activities not contemplated in the solicitation should review the experience of the September 11th Fund, which conducted public opinion surveys, including respondents who did and did not give to a 9/11-related cause, both in New York City and elsewhere.

4. Clarify victim compensation.

By doing away with the long-standing criterion of financial need for receipt of charitable donations, Congress made it possible for philanthropic organizations to compensate for lost life. Congress and the philanthropic sector need to decide if this will be a precedent for philanthropic responses to future disasters.

[Charitable] appeals should be specific enough to tell the potential donor how the funds will be used, but broad enough to permit flexibility to respond to needs as they become known.

Perspectives from the Field of Philanthropy

During 2002 and 2003, the staff of Philanthropy News Digest (PND) conducted interviews with leaders from the nonprofit sector on various aspects of the response to the September 11 attacks. These interviews were later collected in September 11: Perspectives from the Field of Philanthropy, volumes one and two. The interviews, listed below, are available as part of PND's Newsmakers series (www.fdncenter.org/pnd/newsmakers/). In addition, each volume of collected interviews is available as a downloadable PDF file at www.fdncenter.org/research/911/book.html and www.fdncenter.org/research/911/book2.html.

SEPTEMBER 11: THE PHILANTHROPIC RESPONSE

must take into account the unprecedented challenges presented by that awful day: the suddenness and utter unexpectedness of the precipitating events, the time required to identify the full array of needs, confusion about the role philanthropy should play with respect to emergency relief and compensation, and the difficulties of coordinating the public/private response when existing programs and procedures were clearly inadequate. The timeline format can remind us of another important consideration: the powerful emotional response of a horror- and grief-stricken nation.

Giving in the Aftermath of September 11

Final Update on the Foundation and Corporate Response

The unprecedented outpouring of charitable support that followed the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks prompted the Foundation Center to launch a multi-year effort to track relief and recovery funding by foundations, corporations, and other institutional donors. Our goal early on was to document the philanthropic response as it was happening so that grantmakers and charities could better identify unmet needs and to help the field respond to questions from the media, government officials, and the general public. Over the longer term, our goal has been to provide a definitive record of the response that will help the philanthropic sector identify its successes and lessons learned, so that it can prepare effectively to respond to future emergencies.

In the first phase of the project — spanning the year following the attacks — we built a comprehensive database of corporate and foundation contributions in response to 9/11 and issued a series of summary reports examining the role of these donors in financing relief and recovery, mainly through support of 9/11 relief and regranting funds. In the second phase, we focused on the ultimate uses and beneficiaries of the donations raised by the relief funds from all sources, and we issued a comprehensive report on their funding activities and practices.¹

KEY FACTS AND FIGURES ON FOUNDATION AND CORPORATE GIVING:*

Donors:

- The Foundation Center has identified 1,339 foundations, corporations, and other institutional donors that made gifts in response to 9/11
- These donors gave over $1.1 billion in more than 4,500 gifts for relief and recovery efforts and for issues related to the attacks, e.g., bioterrorism and civil rights
- Giving by institutional donors represented 39 percent of an estimated $2.8 billion in total private 9/11-related giving
- 301 donors contributed in excess of $1 million each for relief and recovery
- The median amount of giving per donor was $100,000
- Foundations and corporations in the tri-state area (New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut) provided 52 percent of all giving

Recipients and Beneficiaries:

- 278 relief and regranting funds created to aid victims, their families, and communities affected by the disaster received support from institutional donors totaling $773 million
- The September 11th Fund of the United Way of New York City/New York Community Trust received $163 million, surpassing all other organizations; the American Red Cross Liberty Disaster Relief Fund received $150 million
- 1,538 direct-service providers, groups directly affected by the attacks, and organizations addressing 9/11-related issues received $235 million
- Among direct-service organizations, arts and culture groups affected by the attacks received $56 million; local human service agencies providing aid to affected persons and communities garnered nearly $55 million
- Recipient organizations and funds were located in 44 states and 12 countries

*Based on data compiled by the Foundation Center through September 2004.

While the scope of our 9/11-related efforts has expanded, we have continued to track the foundation and corporate response. Specifically, in the latest year we have added many new donors to our 9/11 database and documented the purposes of many hundreds of gifts. This fourth and final version of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11 provides a definitive and comprehensive overview of foundation and corporate donors and their beneficiaries. Based on data compiled through September 2004, this study updates and expands on the findings presented in our December 2003 report.² The latest information was drawn primarily from 2002 and 2003 annual reports provided by foundation and corporate donors and from data reported by private foundations in their Form 990-PF tax returns. Information also comes from grantmaker news releases and Web sites and donor lists compiled by leading recipients, such as the American Red Cross and the September 11th Fund of the United Way of New York City and the New York Community Trust.

DONORS

Institutional donors include corporations and corporate foundations; independent and family foundations; community foundations and other public foundations; and a variety of business and professional associations.

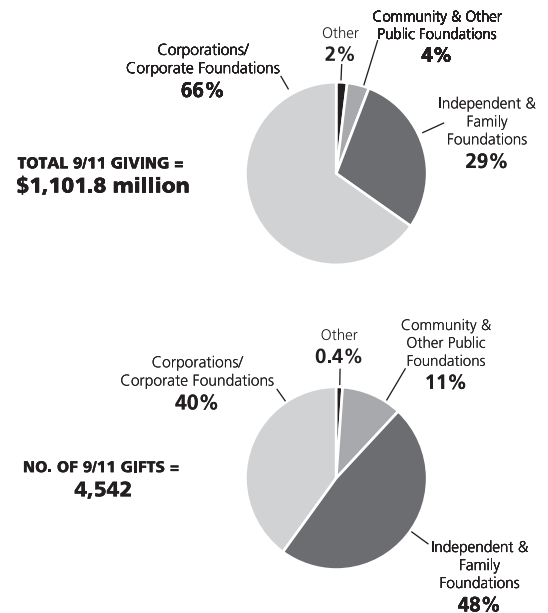

- The Foundation Center has identified 1,339 foundations, corporations, and other institutional donors that have together contributed more than $1.1 billion for relief and recovery efforts and for purposes related to the 9/11 attacks and their aftermath (Table 1).³ The sweeping breadth of the response has proven a milestone for philanthropy. Prior to 9/11, the institutional philanthropic response to natural disasters and other regional or international crises had been far narrower in scope.
- Giving by institutional donors represented 39 percent of an estimated $2.8 billion in total private giving in response to 9/11 (Figure 1).⁴ To put this spending in perspective, this proportion is more than double the share of all U.S. private giving provided annually by foundations and corporations in recent years.⁵
- Foundations and corporations reported a total of 4,542 donations. The number of gifts has increased dramatically from prior editions of this report, as 9/11 donors have fulfilled their undesignated pledges and as more funders have provided complete reporting of the exact amounts given to named recipients.⁶

FIGURE 3
Corporate Foundation Giving as a Share of All Corporate 9/11 Giving

Source: The Foundation Center, December 2004.
 Includes 276 corporate foundations.

By Funder Type

- 632 corporations pledged $721.8 million, or 66 percent of all institutional giving made in response to the 9/11 attacks (Figure 2).⁷ This figure includes cash donations and more than $126 million pledged to match employee gifts.⁸ (In-kind gifts were excluded from this analysis.⁹)
- Corporate donors reported 1,829 donations to named recipient groups, mainly 9/11 relief funds.¹⁰ These donations represented two-fifths of all gifts designated for specific purposes. Another 30 percent of the number of corporate donations went to direct-service organizations providing a variety of services to those directly and indirectly affected by the attacks.
- Among various types of corporate donors were 276 corporate foundations. They contributed $360 million, or 50 percent of all corporate 9/11 giving (Figure 3). This is close to double the proportion of total annual corporate giving typically provided by corporate foundations. Possible explanations for this higher proportion include corporations' use of their foundations' endowments to help fund the unbudgeted 9/11 donations, e.g., for matching employee contributions and providing direct assistance to victims or their families.
- 701 independent and community or other public foundations pledged $360.1 million, or about 33 percent of institutional 9/11 funding. Independent foundations alone provided $315.5 million, while community foundations contributed $23.1 million and other public foundations gave $21.5 million.
- Independent and community and other public foundations reported 2,697 gifts to specific recipient organizations, or 59 percent of all institutional gifts reported. Independent foundations alone made 2,180 gifts, or 48 percent of all designated gifts. In addition to supporting relief funds, larger independent foundations funded a wide range of local and national direct-service providers, groups directly affected by the 9/11 attacks, and organizations addressing issues related to the attacks and their aftermath. (See "Recipients and Beneficiaries" for an analysis of 9/11 giving to recipient organizations.)
- Fifteen associations, including business groups, sports groups, and trade unions pledged $19.8 million, or close to 2 percent of the total. They reported 16 gifts, or less than 1 percent of designated gifts.

Like corporations, they mainly channeled their support through 9/11 relief funds.

By Range of Giving

- Giving per funder ranged from less than $500 for a small community foundation in Michigan to the $50.5 million pledged by the New York-based Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, which ranked eighth among U.S. independent foundations by giving in 2002. Among corporations, giving ranged from less than $5,000 to the $16.3 million pledged by ExxonMobil through its foundation.
- Seventy-one percent of all institutional donors gave less than $500,000 for 9/11 relief and recovery (Table 2 and Figure 4). The median amount — the mid-point for all donors ranked by giving — was $100,000, but it varied widely by donor type. Among the principal donor types in the Foundation Center’s 9/11 database, the median giving amount ranged from $25,000 for independent foundations, including family foundations, to $295,000 for corporations overall and $376,000 for corporate foundations. For community foundations it was $31,100; for other public foundations, $100,000; and for associations, $500,000.
- 301 donors (22 percent) contributed $1 million or more for relief and recovery efforts. Together they gave $974.8 million, or 88 percent of total funding.
- $1 million+ contributors included 232 corporations, 49 independent foundations, seven community foundations, seven public foundations, and six associations. Thirty-seven percent of the corporate donors gave $1 million or more in 9/11 response funding, compared to 9 percent for independent and community foundations.
- Sixty-three donors — fewer than 5 percent — pledged $5 million or more. Their contributions totaled $617.6 million, or 56 percent of institutional 9/11 giving. The proportion of funding provided by the largest contributors varied by donor type. For example, 46 corporations — or roughly 7 percent of the corporate donors — reported giving $5 million or more, and they represented 53 percent of the corporate giving. In contrast, only 14 independent and community foundations — just 2 percent — gave $5 million or more, yet they provided 64 percent of 9/11 giving by these foundations.

foundations provided more than two-fifths of all 9/11 response funding ($467 million) (Figure 5 and Table 6). Tri-state (NY, NJ, CT) grantmakers together contributed over half of all support ($572.2 million). Seven of the top ten independent foundations, four of the top ten public foundations, and six of the top ten corporate donors were located or headquartered in New York State or the tri-state area.

- California ranked second after New York among states providing institutional philanthropic support, with close to 9 percent of funding ($93.9 million). The California Endowment, the largest California-based 9/11 donor, ranked seventh among independent foundation donors, while ChevronTexaco Corporation, the second largest California donor, placed eighth among corporate 9/11 contributors.

- Twenty-four donors — mainly corporations — based outside of the United States provided roughly 1 percent of 9/11 response funding ($12.1 million). Canada represented the largest number of donors (9), and Japan accounted for the largest giving amount ($3.6 million), followed by Canada and the Netherlands. It should be noted that many foreign and multinational companies donated 9/11 funds through their U.S.-based affiliates. Therefore, the total amount reported does not represent all funding from overseas corporations and foundations.

By Funder Size

The following analysis of 9/11 giving by funder size is limited to independent, community, and corporate foundations for which asset information is available in the Foundation Center's foundation database.¹² While not all foundations maintain large endowments relative to their giving, asset size nevertheless provides one criterion for assessing giving capacity.

- Larger foundations represented the majority of the 9/11 foundation donors identified by the Foundation Center. Nearly two-thirds (64 percent) of the 647 independent and community foundation 9/11 donors held at least $10 million in assets in their latest fiscal year, while 43 percent held at least $50 million in assets (Table 7 and Figure 6).¹³

- Large foundations provided the vast majority of 9/11 support. The 281 foundation donors holding at least $50 million in assets accounted for almost 86 percent of all 9/11 giving by independent and community foundations. The 30 foundation 9/11 donors with assets of $1 billion or more provided 66 percent of all foundation 9/11 giving ($224 million).
- Compared with independent and community foundations, the 276 corporate foundations that made 9/11 gifts were more equally distributed by asset size. Just over two-fifths (43 percent) held assets of $10 million or more, while just 15 percent held at least $50 million in assets. One-fourth of corporate foundation donors held less than $1 million in assets (Table 8 and Figure 7).¹⁴
- Despite the more even distribution of corporate foundation 9/11 donors by asset size, larger corporate foundations also provided a majority of corporate foundation 9/11 funding. In the top asset ranges, those reporting assets of $10 million or more accounted for 61 percent of all corporate foundation 9/11 giving. Those holding assets of $50 million or more contributed 34 percent of all corporate foundation 9/11 support.

RECIPIENTS AND BENEFICIARIES

The following is an analysis of contributions from institutional donors to more than 1,800 recipient groups, including relief funds created by relief agencies, government agencies, corporations, and foundations to aid 9/11 victims and affected communities; emergency relief and other direct-service providers; local nonprofits directly affected by the disaster and its aftermath; and organizations working on issues related to the attacks. As part of our tracking effort, the Foundation Center created a recipient database and classified recipients of gifts from institutional donors by geographic location, organization type, and field of activity.

Relief Funds

- Seven-tenths ($773 million) of the $1.1 billion pledged by foundations, corporations, and other institutional donors supported 278 relief funds created after 9/11 to aid victims, their families, and other persons and communities affected by the disaster, mainly through regranting (Figure 8). These intermediaries included general- and special-purpose funds created by relief agencies and other nonprofits and also funds created by institutional donors, especially corporations, community and other public foundations, federated funds, and associations.¹⁵

- The September 11th Fund was the largest 9/11 relief fund ranked by amount received from institutional donors ($162.5 million, or 15 percent) and number of gifts (589). It also ranked as the top recipient in the Foundation Center’s database overall (Table 9). The Fund’s broad purposes include providing direct assistance to victims and their families and services to affected communities. Excluding donations raised for the Fund in a national telethon, foundations and corporations provided 41 percent of the Fund’s reported $410 million in private support. (Including the telethon pledges, the Fund received $540 million.¹⁶)
- The American Red Cross Liberty Disaster Relief Fund, which raised funds for victims and their families and also provided direct services, ranked second in institutional donor contributions ($150.2 million, or 14 percent) and in number of gifts (393). Yet, compared with the September 11th Fund, foundations and corporations provided a much smaller, 15 percent share of the Liberty Fund’s $1 billion in overall support.¹⁷ (Most of the fund’s support came from individuals.) The Liberty Fund captured roughly 36 percent of the estimated $2.8 billion in private 9/11 response funding.
- Other top 9/11 relief fund recipients of institutional donors’ gifts included the Twin Towers Fund ($51 million) and the New York Police and Fire 9/11 Widows’ and Children’s Benefit Fund ($28.9 million), both established to aid the families of New York City police, firefighters, and rescue workers who were victims of the attacks; and the Families of Freedom Scholarship Fund ($24.3 million), a national-level fund that provides post-secondary educational assistance to dependents of those killed or injured in the attacks.
- Relief funds created by more than 60 corporations to aid victims (especially employees) and their families and to support relief and recovery efforts together received $173.2 million, or 16 percent of all institutional funding. Eight corporate funds received at least $10 million in support (Table 10). The largest relief fund recipient by far was the Citigroup Relief Fund, which received $15.1 million from the Citigroup Foundation to provide post-secondary scholarships to the children of victims.
- The vast majority, or roughly nine-tenths, of the $773 million received by relief funds from foundations and corporations provided emergency relief and disaster assistance. Still, some of the largest 9/11 charities focused their giving for specific fields or funding priorities: $76 million supported educational purposes, mainly through grants to various scholarship funds and a school relief fund; roughly $31 million targeted community development and economic recovery, especially through funds aiding affected businesses and nonprofits; and more than $6 million supported general and public health issues. Other fields that raised more than $1 million each from institutional donors through special-purpose funds included arts and culture, mental health, civil rights, and international affairs.

Direct-Service Providers

- 1,538 direct-service providers, groups directly affected by the 9/11 attacks, and organizations addressing issues related to the attacks and their aftermath received $234.5 million, or roughly 21 percent of funding. These organizations took in 2,318 donations from institutional funders, or 51 percent of their gifts.
- The NYU Downtown Hospital, a medical facility located just three blocks from ground zero, was the top direct-service recipient. It received contributions totaling $5.9 million, including $5 million from the Lehman Brothers Foundation (NY) for renovation and expansion of its emergency center. The center’s services were heavily utilized following the attacks. In all, 45 organizations and institutions received $1 million or more from donors — mainly foundations — for outreach services, emergency needs, special programming, advocacy, repairs and renovation, and operating support. More than 478 groups received $100,000 or more. A large majority of organizations received less than $50,000.
- About 9 percent of institutional giving ($94.4 million) could not be assigned to a recipient because donors either did not break down amounts pledged to named recipients ($62 million, or 6 percent) or did not designate a recipient ($32.4 million, or 3 percent).¹⁸

By Donor Type

- Corporate donors pledged 22 percent of their 9/11 funding ($157.6 million) to corporate relief funds, 18 percent to the American Red Cross Liberty Disaster Relief Fund, 15 percent to the September 11th Fund, and 20 percent to other relief funds, especially the Twin Towers Fund and the New York Police and Fire 9/11 Widows’ and Children’s Benefit Fund (Figure 9). Just under 9 percent of corporate giving ($62 million) supported direct-service agencies. Seven percent of corporate pledges ($50 million) could not be allocated by recipient, while roughly 4 percent ($27.7 million) was undesignated. (A substantial portion of corporate donors’ undesignated giving represents funds pledged to match employee gifts.)

- Independent and community or other public foundations gave 16 percent of their 9/11 funding ($55.9 million) to the September 11th Fund and 5 percent to the American Red Cross Liberty Disaster Relief Fund; another 33 percent of donations went to various other relief funds (Figure 10). In contrast with corporate donors, the single largest share of foundation funding — $158.1 million, or 44 percent — supported direct-service organizations active in relief and recovery efforts or addressing issues related to the attacks. Only 2 percent of funds ($7 million) could not be broken down by recipient, and just 1 percent ($4.2 million) of pledges was undesignated.
- Corporations and foundations differed strikingly in the degree to which they supported relief funds. Corporations gave 64 percent of their 1,829 gifts to corporate and other relief funds and 30 percent to direct-service organizations. Another 6 percent of gifts remains undesignated or unspecified. In contrast, 65 percent of foundations’ 2,697 gifts went to direct-service organizations, including nonprofits affected by 9/11 and those addressing related issues, while 33 percent went to relief funds. A modest 2 percent of foundation gifts was undesignated or could not be allocated by recipient.

By Recipient Location

- Foundations and corporations supported 9/11 relief funds and service organizations located in 44 states and twelve countries, including Afghanistan and Pakistan. New York-based funds and recipients garnered $609 million, or 55 percent of all 9/11 response funding (Figure 11). They received 2,466 gifts, or 54 percent of the total, including many of those to direct-service providers and groups affected by the attacks.
- Including gifts to the American Red Cross Liberty Disaster Relief Fund, recipients in the District of Columbia ranked second by dollars received ($198.1 million), followed by California ($35.6 million) and Minnesota ($27.5 million). The DisneyHAND: Survivor Relief Fund, a regranting fund, was the top California recipient, with $6.9 million in gifts from the Walt Disney Company’s foundation and contributions program. In Minnesota, Scholarship America garnered $24.3 million from foundations and corporations across the country to support various long-term scholarship funds benefiting the dependents of victims. Organizations in eight states received a combined total of at least $10 million each from institutional donors for 9/11-related causes. Recipients included local 9/11 relief funds, local chapters of the American Red Cross and Salvation Army, fire departments and emergency services, and nonprofits working locally, nationally, and internationally on issues related to the attacks.

By Recipient Field of Activity

As noted above, recipients fell into two broad categories: relief funds and direct-service agencies. The following is an analysis of funding for direct-service organization recipients by principal field of activity. Recipients were coded using the National Taxonomy of Exempt Entities. Direct-service organizations received more than 2,318 gifts totaling nearly $234 million, mainly from foundations. Of that total, roughly $223 million could be identified by recipient field.

- Arts and culture groups ranked first by share of funding for direct-service organizations ($55.7 million, or 25 percent) and second by number of gifts (480, or nearly 22 percent) (Figure 12 and Table 11). The vast majority of gifts supported performing and visual arts groups and museums in the New York metropolitan area that suffered displacement or substantial loss of income following the attacks. Cultural recipients also included public broadcasting and other media organizations. By far the largest provider of emergency support for affected arts groups was the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, which distributed nearly $38 million in direct grants and an additional $8 million through support for intermediaries, such as the New York

Arts Recovery Fund. The top New York-based cultural recipients included the Museum of Modern Art, Metropolitan Museum of Art, American Museum of Natural History, WNYC Foundation, Whitney Museum of Modern Art, Brooklyn Institute for Arts and Science, and Lower Manhattan Cultural Council. Other leading recipients were the Smithsonian Institution and National Public Radio, both located in the District of Columbia, and Facing History and Ourselves National Foundation in Massachusetts.

- Human service providers accounted for the second largest share of funding to direct-service organizations ($54.6 million, or 25 percent) and the largest share of gifts (831, or 37 percent). Funding supported multipurpose human service agencies, including 82 chapters of the American Red Cross, but also agencies working in such areas as food distribution (e.g., City Harvest, NY); legal services (e.g., Legal Aid Society, NY); employment (e.g., Los Angeles Alliance for a New Economy); and youth development (e.g., Big Brothers/Big Sisters of NYC). Included among the largest multipurpose recipients were local community organizations serving Arab and other ethnic communities, such as the Michigan-based Arab Community Center for Economic and Social Services.
- Public affairs/society benefit organizations ranked third by share of 9/11 funding for service organizations ($43.6 million, or 20 percent) and share of gifts (386, or 17 percent). Roughly one-third of funding supported philanthropy organizations, such as community foundations, United Ways, and other federated funds. The next largest share of funds went to public affairs groups and government agencies, including a $2.5 million grant from the California-based Cisco Systems Foundation to the City of New York Office of Emergency Management to provide infrastructure support for the relief effort and support for children and families of victims. The remaining funds were divided between community improvement organizations active in recovery and rebuilding efforts and civil rights and advocacy groups. In the former category, top recipients included the Regional Plan Association of New York, which convened the Civic Alliance to Rebuild Downtown New York to develop strategies for redeveloping Lower Manhattan; and Working Partnerships USA (CA) for the Bay Area Worker Relief Project, which supported workers in the tourist industry who experienced economic distress due to the effects of the September 11 attacks. Civil rights groups included local and national organizations, such as the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation (NY), New York Immigration Coalition, Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund (NY), and American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee (DC).

- Educational organizations and institutions received 13 percent of 9/11 funding ($28.9 million) and 9 percent of gifts (198) for service organizations. While a small portion of funds targeted Lower Manhattan schools and institutions directly affected by the attacks, by far the largest share supported higher and graduate educational institutions across the country for activities addressing issues related to the attacks. For example, Columbia University (NY) received $2.8 million to research and develop public education programs on 9/11-related topics ranging from anti-discrimination to public health and bio-terrorism. Libraries, especially the New York Public Library ($3.1 million) and branch libraries in Brooklyn and Queens, received the second largest share of education funding. Support came mainly in the form of grants from the Andrew W. Mellon and Starr Foundations to replace income lost due to the economic effects of the attacks. Grants also funded educational support organizations, such as the New York-based After-School Corporation and Sponsors for Educational Opportunity, and the DC-based WAVE, Inc., a school dropout prevention program.
- Health care organizations and institutions, including hospitals, blood banks, and emergency medical services providing for affected communities, as well as counseling and mental health groups around the country, garnered 10 percent of 9/11 funding ($23.2 million) and 6.7 percent of gifts (150). In addition to the NYU Downtown Hospital (mentioned earlier), top health recipients included the Task Force for Child Survival and Development, which received a $2.9 million grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation for a public health information system project to improve bio-terrorism readiness; Saint Vincent’s Hospital and Medical Center (NY), which provided emergency services to victims and workers at ground zero; the Children’s Health Fund (NY); and America’s Health Together (DC).
- The majority of the remaining 9/11 funds for service organizations supported international affairs, relief, and human rights groups in the United States and overseas. Small amounts of funding also went to environmental and animal welfare organizations, social science research groups, and churches and interfaith councils.

9/11-RELATED FOUNDATION GRANTS AWARDED IN 2003

Foundations continued to report new grants for 9/11-related purposes through year-end 2003. In all, the Foundation Center identified 68 grants awarded in 2003¹ totaling $7,547,336. These grants were reported by 19 donors, of which the vast majority were large New York-based independent foundations.

While some of the newer grants provided ongoing support for 9/11-related funds or outreach programs initiated in the aftermath of the attacks, the majority of them funded either new long-term service initiatives — such as mental health and general health care coverage for those affected by the attacks — or emerging social issues in the post-9/11 world, with an emphasis on preserving civil liberties and human rights and fostering religious and racial tolerance, especially in areas with Arab and other immigrant communities across the country. New grants also focused on homeland security and local disaster preparedness; business recovery and nonprofit organization assistance; rebuilding efforts; the creation of memorials; and foreign policy.

Community leaders with experience in earlier disaster recovery efforts, especially those from Oklahoma City,² had warned 9/11 donors about the critical need for long-term philanthropic resources. These 2003 grants suggest that some foundations did heed this advice and are taking a long-term approach.

Examples of 2003 Donors and Beneficiaries:

- By far the largest new grant was the Starr Foundation’s $1 million award to the New York City Police Foundation for technological and communications equipment to support counter-terrorism and crime prevention programs.
- The Ford Foundation awarded the year’s second largest grant of $700,000 to Public Interest Projects (NY) for start-up support for the Freedom Fund, a national fundraising and grantmaking collaborative to advance immigrants’ and human rights in the post-9/11 context. Among its other grants, Ford gave $100,000 to the Circle Foundation’s Center for the Study of Policy Attitudes (MD) to conduct public opinion research to help U.S. policymakers understand post-9/11 public attitudes on the nation’s role in the world.
- The Alfred P. Sloan Foundation (NY) gave $294,000 to Project Rebirth (NY) to develop and launch a state-of-the art Web site centered around the rebuilding of Ground Zero; and $45,000 to New York University to evaluate post-9/11 economic assistance for small businesses and nonprofits in lower Manhattan.
- The Richard and Rhoda Goldman Fund (CA) gave $200,000 to America’s Health Together (DC) to expand its “Facing Fear Together” program, which is a national initiative addressing mental health issues related to exposure to homeland terrorism in the United States.

- In a related grant, the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation (NJ) awarded $103,000 to America’s Health Together to improve mental health services and primary care in a time of terrorism.
- The Commonwealth Fund (NY) made a grant of just over $100,000 to Lake, Snell, Perry and Associates (DC) for a project to assist New Yorkers with the transition from disaster relief Medicaid to permanent health coverage, and nearly $100,000 to the Asian American Federation of New York for its “Informing Initiative” to expand health coverage after September 11 in New York City’s Chinatown.
- The MetLife Foundation, a New York-based corporate donor, made several grants in 2003 to local area organizations for ongoing disaster relief and recovery efforts, including $150,000 to the Children’s Health Fund, $135,000 to the Floating Hospital, and $100,000 to the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation.
- The Andy Warhol Foundation for the Visual Arts (NY) provided continuing support for local affected arts groups, including a $50,000 grant to the Alliance for the Arts for “The Arts Rebuild New York” campaign.
- The New York Community Trust and the California Endowment reported the largest number of 2003 grants related to 9/11 (12 each). Among the Trust’s grants, four provided about $50,000 each to local groups such as the Nonprofit Coordinating Committee of New York and New York Cares, to use lessons learned from the 9/11 attacks to help nonprofits develop disaster response and business continuity plans, and a $40,000 grant to the DC-based ADC Research Institute, an arm of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, to combat post-9/11 discrimination against Arab-American New Yorkers.
- The California Endowment’s 12 grants to organizations in its home state for various 9/11-related projects included a $200,000 grant to Chinese for Affirmative Action for “United Response to Backlash Hate, Violence, and Discrimination,” a five-agency collaborative to create a coordinated response to post-9/11-related acts of violence against immigrants in the Bay Area, and almost $189,000 to the Orange County Human Relations Council for “Living Room Dialogues,” a program to increase racial and religious tolerance by engaging in community-building activities that bring together diverse people, including Muslims and Arabs throughout Orange County.

1. These grants included one 2004 grant from the Starr Foundation for $100,000.

2. At an event marking the release of the September 11th Fund’s six-month report, Nancy Anthony, executive director of the Oklahoma City Community Foundation, told nonprofit leaders that 30 percent of the funds collected in response to the Oklahoma City bombing were used in years four to six after the disaster; that most requests for counseling came only after the first year, with counseling becoming the single largest ongoing expense; and that seven years after the disaster 10 percent of their cases were still active. See press release, “September 11th Fund Reports Six-Month Disbursements of $205 Million from $456 Million Donated; Plans $250 Million for Future Use,” available from http://national.unitedway.org/news/sept11_sixmonths.cfm; Internet; accessed on 10/15/04.

IMPACT OF 9/11 RESPONSE FUNDING ON PROSPECTS FOR GIVING

The $1.1 billion in 9/11 response funding provided by foundations, corporations, and other institutional donors in such a short time frame was unprecedented. Still, the scale of this funding should be kept in perspective. The $339 million donated by independent and community foundations represented just 1 percent of the $27.2 billion they gave to all causes in 2001, while the $722 million pledged by corporations accounted for less than 6 percent of the estimated $12.9 billion they contributed in the same year.¹⁹ These findings suggest that the impact of the philanthropic response on future giving levels was relatively modest.

Of far greater consequence in terms of its impact on funding capacity, especially of endowed foundations, was the precarious state of the economy at the time of the attacks. In a survey of 9/11 donors conducted in early 2002, grantmakers emphasized that it was the continuing stock market slide — starting well in advance of September 2001 — and not their 9/11 donations that was threatening their future giving prospects and driving changes in grantmaking practice.²⁰

Yet, despite substantial market losses, institutional giving remained remarkably steady in 2002 and declined only modestly in 2003. Independent and community foundation giving slipped by less than 1 percent in 2002, followed by a 3 percent drop in 2003. Over the same period, corporate foundation giving increased 5 percent in 2002, and then decreased by a modest 2 percent in 2003.²¹

While these aggregate findings may not reflect the experience of individual institutional donors, they nevertheless suggest that 9/11 donations helped to bolster overall giving in 2001 and again in 2002, as donors continued to make good on their substantial pledges. In addition, the positive feedback received by foundations and corporations for their unprecedented generosity in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks may have encouraged some funders to maintain relatively high levels of giving despite three years of asset losses — or even to increase their giving. Although many factors need to be taken into account, such as an increased demand for private funding in the wake of draconian cuts in government support triggered by a recession, these results suggest that the immediate foundation and corporate response to America's greatest national tragedy since Pearl Harbor set a historic milestone for the field and stimulated donors to be more philanthropic going forward.

Endnotes

- 1 See Renz, L., 9/11 Relief and Regranting Funds: A Summary Report on Funds Raised and Assistance Provided, New York, NY: Foundation Center, November 2003.
- 2 See Renz, L., Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11: 2003 Update on the Foundation and Corporate Response, New York, NY: Foundation Center, December 2003. Findings were based on data compiled through September 2003.
- 3 Since publication of the December 2003 edition of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11, the number of 9/11 donors identified by the Foundation Center has increased by just over 5 percent, while the total for 9/11 giving has risen by close to 3 percent. These increases reflect more complete reporting by donors of their 9/11 giving as well as donations announced after the latest edition was compiled.
- 4 The estimate of total private 9/11 response funding includes an estimated $2.6 billion raised by major relief funds from all sources and roughly $234 million in gifts and grants from foundations and corporations to direct-service providers. The relief fund total derives from a 2003 survey conducted by the Foundation Center. The total has been adjusted to account for estimated regranting and transfers between funds in the sample that did not provide a detailed breakdown of their gifts. Because of incomplete information and inter-fund regranting, the figure for all 9/11 giving is subject to change.
- 5 See Brown, M., Giving USA 2004: The Annual Report on Philanthropy for the Year 2003, Indianapolis, IN: AAFRC Trust for Philanthropy, 2004. The report provides revised 2002 overall private giving figures.
- 6 Since publication of the December 2003 edition of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11, the number of gifts has increased by almost 18 percent (from 4,031). This increase mainly reflects more detailed and complete reporting of recipient names and gift amounts by donors. Many foundations that announced large pledges immediately following the attacks waited to assess needs before earmarking the funds for specific recipients. To a lesser extent, the increase reflects gifts reported by the 68 donors that are new to the 9/11 funding database.
- 7 For the purpose of this analysis, giving by separate corporate-directed entities — including corporate foundations, corporate direct-giving programs, and corporate affiliates and subsidiaries — has been collapsed into a single 9/11 giving figure tied to the corporate parent.
- 8 Some companies reporting matching gifts did not provide an exact dollar figure. As a result, the actual figure for 9/11-related employee matching gifts is likely higher. Also, to avoid double counting of 9/11-related gifts, the matching gift amount includes gifts from the company only; it excludes roughly $80 million donated by individual employees.
- 9 Corporate donors in the 9/11 funding database reported in-kind gift pledges totaling $73 million. Because many donors did not affix monetary values to in-kind gifts, and the relative value of in-kind gifts reported is difficult to measure, these pledges have been excluded from the analysis.
- 10 Since publication of the December 2003 edition of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11, the number of company-sponsored gifts identified by the Foundation Center's 9/11 database has increased by more than 12 percent (up from 1,627).
- 11 An international endowed philanthropy with a principal domicile outside the United States, the Atlantic Philanthropies operates like an independent foundation and maintains a grant selection and administration office in New York.
- 12 Since corporate direct giving programs do not maintain assets, comparisons can only be made with corporate foundations.
- 13 By comparison, only about 7 percent of U.S. foundations overall held assets of $10 million or more, while less than 2 percent held assets of $50 million or more. Fiscal year reported was 2002 for most foundations, 2001 for others.

SEPTEMBER 11: THE PHILANTHROPIC RESPONSE

- 14 By comparison, roughly 12 percent of the nation's 2,362 corporate foundations held assets of $10 million or more, while almost 3 percent held assets of $50 million or more. More than half held less than $1 million in assets.
- 15 Since publication of the December 2003 edition of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11 the total number of relief funds tracked in the Foundation Center's 9/11 database has had a net decrease due to reclassification of some of funds. For more detailed information about relief funds and their giving patterns, see the Foundation Center's 9/11 Relief and Regranting Funds, December 2003.
- 16 See September 11th Fund of the United Way of New York and the New York Community Trust, "The September 11th Fund: Year Three," available from www.september11fund.org; Internet; accessed 9/23/04. The September 11th Fund announced on September 7, 2004, that its final grantmaking and administrative activities will cease in December 2004. Services being provided to those already enrolled will continue to be delivered through January 2005, and no enrollment or service deadline has been set for the 9/11 Mental Health and Substance Abuse program created in cooperation with the American Red Cross.
- 17 See American Red Cross, "2002 Corporate Annual Report," available from www.redcross.org; Internet; accessed on 9/23/04.
- 18 Since publication of the December 2003 edition of Giving in the Aftermath of 9/11, the proportion of undesignated pledges and giving that is not broken down by recipient fell from 11 percent to 9 percent.
- 19 Since some 9/11 pledges were paid in 2002, this comparison overestimates the share of overall 2001 foundation and corporate giving directed to the 9/11 response. Nonetheless, these comparisons provide a useful yardstick for the scale of private institutional support. For more information on overall annual corporate giving, see revised 2001 figures in Giving USA 2002 (2003).
- 20 See Renz, L., Assessing the Post-9/11 Funding Environment: Grantmakers' Perspectives, New York, NY: Foundation Center, 2002.
- 21 Based on estimates from Giving USA, overall corporate giving increased 10.3 percent in 2002 and rose another 4.2 percent in 2003.

Philanthropy and September 11

A Bibliography

This bibliography of books, pamphlets, and articles related to September 11 is selected from the Literature of the Nonprofit Sector Online (LNPS), the Foundation Center's free, searchable catalog of the published material about philanthropy. LNPS represents the literature acquired for the Foundation Center's five libraries due to its relevance to: visitors to our libraries, trustees and staff of foundations and nonprofit organizations, fundraisers, representatives of government agencies, the media, librarians, and the burgeoning numbers of scholars and students interested in reading and writing about the philanthropic sector of American society.

The listing is organized in alphabetical order by author or main entry, and contains descriptive abstracts for most entries. Each of the items in this bibliography is available in at least one of the Center's five libraries. Several of the items contain URLs, indicating where entire reports can be located on the Internet.

The citations range from late 2001 through mid-2004. Much of the literature during that period related to the establishment of charities to aid victims, data on the monies contributed, controversies that arose over disbursement of Anft, Michael. "Assisting Terrorism's Other Victims." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 15 (September 4, 2003): p. 7–8, 10.

Explains that more foundations have begun to support charities that serve immigrants from Arab and predominantly Muslim countries facing post-September 11 backlash in the United States. Smaller organizations, however, have found fundraising difficult under the increased scrutiny of federal investigators looking for ties to terrorist groups.

Anft, Michael. "Immigrant-Rights Organizations Face Fallout from September 11." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (January 10, 2002): p. 18–9.

In the aftermath of the September 11 attacks, nonprofit immigration groups have found it more difficult to fundraise and draw support for immigrants' rights.

Association of Fundraising Professionals. Study of the Impact of the Events of September 11 on Charities. Alexandria, VA: Association of Fundraising Professionals, 2002. 49 p.

Reports findings from an Association of Fundraising Professionals survey studying the effects of the September 11 attacks on fundraising. The survey was conducted from November 2001 to early January 2002, with 248 members responding. The report covers the effect of September 11 on specific fundraising campaigns, including direct mail, planned giving, major gifts, online solicitation, and annual campaigns. Also describes the impact of September 11 on fundraising strategies, donor attitudes, and business operations.

Baron, Barnett F. "Philanthropy and Homeland Security." Foundation News & Commentary, vol. 45 (May–June 2004): p. 30–3.

Baron analyzes the USA PATRIOT Act and its impact on international grantmaking. The U.S. Treasury Department has indicated its concern that philanthropy may be a major source of support for terrorist activity, but a recent report by the General Accounting Office has called that supposition into question.

Bernacchi, Gina. "Corporate Giving Picks Up Despite Weak Economy, Attacks." NonProfit Times, vol. 15 (November 1, 2001): p. 1, 10, 12.

At this time it appears that corporate giving will increase substantially in 2001 over 2000, perhaps largely due to the September 11 attacks.

Bernacchi, Gina. "Giving Grew after September 11 Terror Attacks." NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (June 1, 2002): p. 1, 6.

Discusses the impact of the September 11 terrorist attacks on fundraising, analyzing results from reports published by the Association of Fundraising Professionals. While arts, cultural, and humanities organizations witnessed a decline in donations in October 2001, year-end fundraising totals of nearly all nonprofits were higher than in 2000.

Blum, Debra E. “Hundreds of Displaced N.Y. Charities Face Financial, Other Losses in Attack.” Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 13 (October 4, 2001): p. 12.

Describes how nonprofits in lower Manhattan are coping with the damage caused by the September 11 terrorist attacks. Explains that many organizations not directly affected by the disaster will witness a growing demand in social services. Provides a list of grantmakers and other nonprofits that are offering financial and technical support.

Blum, Debra E. “New Telemarketing Law Called Too Restrictive by Some Fund Raisers.” Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 15, 2001): p. 21.

The Federal Trade Commission has new authority to regulate appeals by telemarketers; those in the industry claim the rules are burdensome. HR 3162 is a broad anti-terrorism bill that included these new regulations in the anticipation of fraudulent fundraising schemes after the September 11 attacks.

Cohen, Rick. "Reflecting upon the Charitable Response of September 11: We've Just Begun." Nonprofit Quarterly, vol. 9 (Spring 2002): p. 16–20.

Numerous unique issues were raised by the donations that poured in after September 11, such as how to define a victim, what is excessive charity, use of donations for administrative expenses, and many more. This article outlines some of the major concerns, and argues for the sector to learn from mistakes that were made, and also the unprecedented accomplishments that were achieved.

"Congressional Hearings on 9-11 Relief Organizations: BBB Wise Giving Alliance Speaks Out for Donors." Better Business Bureau Wise Giving Guide, (Winter 2001): p. 4–10.

Reprints excerpts of Congressional testimony by executives of the American Red Cross, Salvation Army, September 11th Fund, and others regarding their organizations' response to donors' expectations and victims' needs.

Corporate Contributions in 2001: Executive Summary. New York, NY: Conference Board, 2003. 10 p.

This is the executive summary of the annual statistical analysis delving into the contributions of 187 companies in 2001. Data indicates a total of $4.52 billion in giving, of which $648 million was earmarked for disaster and relief related to the September 11 attacks.

Cox, Linda R. September 11th Relief Funds: A Report at Six Months. New York, NY: New York Regional Association of Grantmakers, 2002. 12 p.

Lists 37 relief funds that responded to the needs of victims and families in the wake of September 11, and provides some statistics about the amounts raised and distributed, as well as the charities' approach to the task at hand.

Cross, Devon Gaffney. "Arms and the Foundation." Philanthropy, vol. 16 (January–February 2002): p. 22–5.

Author asserts that foundations should play a greater role in supporting national security in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Curtis, Jody. "Set Up before the Sun Set." Foundation News & Commentary, vol. 42 (November–December 2001): p. 28–31.

Explains how the September 11th Fund came about, and its progress to date in supporting the families of September 11 victims.

Derryck, Dennis; Abzug, Rikki. "Lessons from Crisis: New York City Nonprofits Post-September 11." Nonprofit Quarterly, vol. 9 (Spring 2002): p. 6–11.

The authors provide a look at how neighborhood nonprofits in New York City have fared in the two months after the destruction of the September 11 attacks, based on their survey of more than one hundred that replied to their questionnaire.

SEPTEMBER 11: THE PHILANTHROPIC RESPONSE

Greene, Stephen G. "Borderless Giving Crucial to Solving Global Strife, Experts Say." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (March 21, 2002): p. 10–1.

Discusses remarks from a conference organized by the Global Philanthropy Forum. Some speakers touched on promoting an international philanthropic vision in the aftermath of September 11. Nonprofit leaders also addressed the AIDS epidemic and spoke on the needs of Central Asia.

Greene, Stephen G. "In Disaster's Wake." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (September 5, 2002): p. 4–6, 8.

Explains that the public may have lost confidence in charities after September 11, as critics question the nonprofit sector's ability to handle similar disasters. Observers suggest charities missed opportunities to effectively harness the good will of volunteers and to clearly communicate the value of the nonprofit sector to the public.

Higgins, Heather R. "Fighting Back: How to Avert a Charitable Calamity." Philanthropy, vol. 15 (November–December 2001): p. 9–10.

Suggests changes in federal tax policy that could encourage philanthropy in the wake of the September 11 attacks.

Profiles of four nonprofits whose offices were in the World Trade Center neighborhood: Four Way Books, Safe Horizon, Robin Hood Foundation, and Futures and Options. Their stories sketch out how they experienced the events of September 11 and the months after, as each worked to resume services.

Hoyt, David. "Under Pressure: Where the Charitable Response to 9/11 Went Wrong." Stanford Social Innovation Review, vol. 2 (Summer 2004): p. 66–73.

A case study of the September 11th Fund, which was created on the day of the terrorist attacks in New York City by a collaboration between the New York Community Foundation and the United Way of New York City. While the outpouring of donations to the Fund was unprecedented, and thousands of people were helped, the lack of coordinated and effective communication to the public resulted in several negative stories in the media. Strains developed between the two agencies as some critics questioned the role of the Fund.

An annual statistical analysis of charitable contributions, distribution, donors, recipients, sources of philanthropy, and areas of philanthropic opportunity; this edition covers 2003. Sources analyzed include individuals, bequests, foundations, and corporations. Areas of philanthropic opportunity that are compared for various periods up to 2003 are religion; education; health; human services; arts, culture, and humanities; public/society benefit; environment/wildlife; and international affairs. A separate section lists studies of giving in specific states. Contains numerous charts, lists, and statistical tables. Of particular note are the listings of gifts of five million dollars or more by individuals. Includes a table of the National Taxonomy of Exempt Entities. This edition contains a special section on the subject of philanthropy related to September 11.

Jones, Jeff; Sinclair, Matthew. "Grantmakers' Changes Rooted in Economy, Not Terrorism Fears." NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (November 1, 2002): p. 28, 36.

Summarizes findings from the Foundation Center report, Assessing the Post-September 11 Funding Environment: Grantmakers' Perspective. Over 330 grantmakers responded to the survey that was conducted in Spring 2002. The results indicate that approximately 95 percent of respondents did not change their funding focus after September 11.

Jones, Jeff. "Most Donors Believe Money Was Used Wisely." NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (September 1, 2002): p. 1, 12.

Provides results from a NonProfit Times/Ruotolo Associates national survey on September 11 donations that was taken in late June. Half of the people polled indicated that they gave to September 11 causes, and two-thirds of people who made donations felt that nonprofits used the funds properly.

Jones, Jeff. "Nonprofits Fear False Accusations of Terror Grants." NonProfit Times, vol. 17 (May 1, 2003): p. 1, 4, 6.

Describes laws and voluntary guidelines issued by the federal government to prevent charitable donations from funding terrorism. Discusses how these measures are affecting international grantmaking. Sidebar lists additional resources to help nonprofits comply with guidelines.

Jones, Jeff. "Questions Raised about How IRS OK'd Status." NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (September 1, 2002): p. 1, 4–5.

Describes research performed by NonProfit Times reporters in an effort to contact nonprofits that received expedited tax-exempt status for September 11-related causes. While the reporters had difficulty obtaining information from the organizations, there have been relatively few cases of fraud reported in New York. Changes to the federal tax code have been proposed so that federal officials can disseminate information to state regulators.

Describes how arts organizations have helped with relief efforts in the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attacks. Some arts groups have donated proceeds from performances, while other organizations have provided free programs.
- Renz, Loren; Cuccaro, Elizabeth; Marino, Leslie. 9/11 Relief and Regranting Funds: A Summary Report on Funds Raised and Assistance Provided. New York, NY: Foundation Center, 2003. 27 p.
URL: http://fdncenter.org/research/trends_analysis/pdf/9_11relief_funds.pdf
This survey of 111 9/11-related relief funds revealed that 64.2 percent of these organizations had planned to distribute 100 percent of the funds they raised by year-end 2003. Further, nearly all relief funds with unspent contributions have specific plans for distributing their remaining funds, such as providing long-term assistance and scholarships for children of victims. In addition to the survey findings that are presented in part one, the second part of the report analyzes the actual donations received by 40 of the largest funds, as well as how these funds have distributed this support. Overall, excluding donations from one fund to another, these funds have raised almost $2.9 billion for relief and recovery and contributed $2.2 billion, accounting for the vast majority of dollars raised and disbursed by the more than 350 relief funds created after 9/11. The analysis provides precise breakdowns of funds distributed and estimates of unspent funds by beneficiary group and type of assistance.

Salamon, Lester M. "What Really Matters about September 11." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (September 5, 2002): p. 47–8.

Salamon opines on the response of nonprofits to the cataclysmic events of September 11. Though the philanthropic response was unprecedented and remarkably generous, the coordination of organizations left something to be desired, and that fact will have implications for the future. He warns against "go-it-alone" philanthropy. He suggests that Americans pay greater attention to social justice concerns, noting the relationship of terrorism to the underlying despair that may spawn it, and citing statistics that indicate that the percentage of charitable monies funneled to human services has declined in recent decades. Finally, Salamon encourages Americans to look more closely at efforts to support emerging movements for civil society in the international Islamic community.

Schram, Sanford F. "Social Welfare after September 11." Nonprofit Quarterly, vol. 9 (Spring 2002): p. 21–4.

State budgets are adversely impacted by the loss of the federal budget surplus, and the effect on social welfare programs could be dire, according to this analysis. Other forces are also eating away at the social safety net, and the author decries the erosion of government support for basic needs.

Schwinn, Elizabeth. "Easing of IRS Policy Lets Relief Groups Disburse Funds Regardless of Need." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 29, 2001): p. 30.

In an exception to IRS regulations, funds raised for the victims and families of the September 11 attacks in New York and Washington can be distributed by charities to individuals regardless of need. The new ruling is not without its critics, however. The policy is Notice 2001–78.

A progress report on the September 11th Fund that describes accomplishments and ongoing activities. Includes several first-person accounts.

September 11th: Lessons Learned. Washington, DC: Washington Regional Association of Grantmakers, 2002. 30 p.

Short essays by the heads of many of the organizations involved in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks at the Pentagon: Federal Emergency Management Agency, American Red Cross, Army Emergency Relief, Navy-Marine Corps Relief Society, Greater DC Cares, Community Services Agency of the Metropolitan Washington Council, AFL-CIO, United Way of the National Capital Area, Community Foundation of the National Capital Region, Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments, and Washington Grantmakers.

“Shaken Foundations.” Trust & Foundation News, vol. 58 (September–November 2001): p. 1, 24.

Describes how foundations located near the World Trade Center have been impacted by the September 11 attacks.

Sinclair, Matthew. “Community Service Projects to Remember Victims of 9-11.” NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (May 1, 2002): p. 1, 10, 25.

Describes the recently passed Unity in the Spirit of America Act that will sponsor community service programs in the name of the victims of the September 11 attacks. The Points of Light Foundation and Volunteer Center National Network will be overseeing the projects around the nation.

Sinclair, Matthew; Jones, Jeff. “Following the Money: Meeting the Need.” NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (September 1, 2002): p. 14, 39.

Provides results from a NonProfit Times survey of nearly 300 new charities and funds within existing organizations that were established as a result of the September 11 attacks. Indicates that approximately $2.2 billion was raised and $1.4 billion was disbursed. Also provides specific disbursement figures for several funds.

Organizations that had been created in response to the September 11 attacks have begun preparations for closing, or have already closed. The 9/11 United Services Group that was established to coordinate relief efforts will cease operations by the end of 2004. The number of people seeking assistance from traditional programs is likely to increase during the transition period.

Sinclair, Matthew. “Quick Action, Long Reflection Mark Tragic Year.” NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (September 1, 2002): p. 1, 6, 8.

Discusses lessons that nonprofit leaders have learned about fundraising and disaster relief since the September 11 attacks. Sidebar includes a chart listing the top six relief funds along with disbursement figures.

Sinclair, Matthew. “United Ways Mobilize National Support System: Funneling Money Where It’s Needed.” NonProfit Times, vol. 15 (October 1, 2001): p. 6–7.

Describes how United Ways across the nation have responded to the September 11 terrorist attack. The United Way of New York City and the New York Community Trust established the September 11th Fund.

Souccar, Miriam Kreinin. “Bleak Months in Offing for Arts Groups.” Crain’s New York Business, vol. 17 (November 26, 2001): p. 3, 47.

Most arts groups in New York City foresee a decline in attendance, sales, and fundraising in the next six months, largely due to the effects of the attack on September 11.

Souccar, Miriam Kreinin. "United Way Slashes Funds for Agencies." Crain's New York Business, vol. 18 (July 15, 2002): p. 1, 44.

Many New York City nonprofits will find their United Way grants much smaller this year, due to the fact that about half of the agency's receipts were earmarked for victim relief related to September 11.

Suhrke, Henry C. "A Wannabe Federal Charity Regulator Tries Again." Philanthropy Monthly, vol. 34 (#7-8 2002): p. 5-12.

The Federal Trade Commission has been charged with overseeing charitable solicitation by for-profits, in the wake of several fraudulent schemes after September 11. This is not the first time the FTC has attempted this regulatory role, as this history indicates. The most recent effort is part of the USA PATRIOT Act, legislation passed in the autumn of 2001.

Summary of Findings: Survey of Foundation Communications Issues Post-September 11. Communications Network, [2002]. 3 p.

Presents the results of a survey of 32 communications directors of foundations regarding how their priorities changed (or did not) after September 11, and how the communications function and budget was impacted.

"Under Pressure." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 15, 2001): p. 9.

Now, two months after an unprecedented outpouring of monetary support for victims of the September 11 attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, tough questions are arising. Congress, the press, and the public are looking closely at how funds are disbursed, and some charities are having trouble giving a complete picture. The American Red Cross, and the Liberty Fund that it created, have been a special focus of attention; leaders there are criticized for their plans to earmark a substantial part of the funds in reserve for other needs. In light of the controversy, the organization's chief executive Bernadine Healy has resigned. Other charities have yet to distribute any funds. Some critics are calling for government oversight of the entire relief effort.

Wallace, Nicole. "Online Giving Soars as Donors Turn to the Internet Following Attacks." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 13 (October 4, 2001): p. 22.

Describes the rise in online giving after the September 11 terrorist attack. The American Red Cross reported it has raised $60 million over the Internet thus far.

Wallace, Nicole. "Technology Plays Many Roles in Aftermath of Disaster." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 13 (October 4, 2001): p. 22.

Companies donated hardware and developed Web sites to help with the September 11 relief efforts.

Safeguards that donors can take to reduce the possibility that charitable monies will be utilized to support terrorist activities.

Wilhelm, Ian; Williams, Grant. "American Red Cross Names Interim Chief and Vows Additional Changes." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 15, 2001): p. 10.

In the wake of the controversy over the disbursement of funds collected for the victims of September 11, Harold Decker has been appointed interim chief executive, replacing Bernadine Healy. Healy was criticized for decisions made involving the Liberty Fund, which has collected $564 million to date in gifts and pledges. Decker comes from a background in the pharmaceutical industry.

Wilhelm, Ian. "Former OMB Executive Steps in to Run September 11th Fund." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 15, 2001): p. 18.

An interview with Joshua Gotbaum, who has been appointed chief executive of the September 11th Fund, created by the New York Community Trust and the United Way of New York City.

Wilhelm, Ian. "Half of $2-Billion Raised for September 11 Given Away; Other Recovery Updates." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (March 7, 2002): p. 14–5.

Provides results from a Chronicle survey of organizations that were raising funds for September 11 relief efforts. Sidebar includes a listing of the charities and how much each has distributed thus far.

Wilhelm, Ian. "Nonprofit Groups Search for Better Ways to Manage Disaster Volunteers." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (September 5, 2002): p. 13–4.

Explains that the poor coordination by charities and emergency personnel in managing volunteers after September 11 has prompted nonprofit and government leaders to examine better procedures for handling large numbers of emergency workers. Discusses the challenges and risks involved when working with so-called spontaneous volunteers.

Wilhelm, Ian. "Red Cross Fund Raiser Takes on Unforeseen Challenges." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 13 (October 4, 2001): p. 28.

Profiles Michael D. Farley, a senior fundraiser at the American Red Cross. Provides excerpts from an interview conducted after the September 11 terrorist attack.

Wilhelm, Ian. "Red Cross Plans to Spend All Donations to Help September 11 Attack Victims." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 29, 2001): p. 30.

In a turnaround, the American Red Cross has decided to allocate all funds raised for the relief efforts to the September 11 families of victims. Earlier, the organization had planned to earmark some of the donations for future disasters, a plan that was widely criticized.

Williams, Grant. "Turmoil at the Red Cross: Critics Blame Charity's Leader for Problems in Wake of Attacks." Chronicle of Philanthropy, vol. 14 (November 1, 2001): 2001.

Reports that the American Red Cross, along with its president Bernadine P. Healy, has been facing criticism for the way fundraising efforts have been managed after the September 11 attack. There is confusion over the amount that victims, families, and rescue workers will receive from the charity's Liberty Fund.

Williams, Roger M. "In Solomon's Footsteps: Conversation with Kenneth Feinberg." Foundation News & Commentary, vol. 43 (September–October 2002): p. 20–3.

Kenneth Feinberg heads up the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund of 2001, which was established by the U.S. Congress. In this interview he explains his work and the role of the charity.

Williams, Roger M.; Siska, Darlene. "New York Philanthropy after the Attacks." Foundation News & Commentary, vol. 42 (November–December 2001): p. 22–6.

A roundup about the response of foundations and nonprofits to the September 11 attacks in New York City. Some of the featured programs are Futures & Options for Kids, American Express Foundation, Deutsche Bank Americas Foundation, and Trinity Church. A sidebar presents an interview with Barbara Bryan, head of the New York Regional Association of Grantmakers.

Williamson, Richard; Sinclair, Matthew. "Islamic Charities under Spotlight's Red Glare." NonProfit Times, vol. 16 (January 1, 2002): p. 1, 6, 11.

In the aftermath of the September 11 attacks, the federal government is working to seize the assets of several Islamic nonprofits with alleged ties to terrorist groups. Charities such as the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development in Texas have denied involvement in any terrorist activity.

SEPTEMBER 11: THE PHILANTHROPIC RESPONSE

Williamson, Richard. "Money Comes between Charities, Terror Victims." NonProfit Times, vol. 15 (December 1, 2001): p. 1, 6, 8.

Facing controversy over the management of the Liberty Fund, the American Red Cross has announced that all of the $543 million raised will go toward helping September 11 victims and their families. Discusses the organizational restructuring after the departure of Dr. Bernadine Healy.

Wirthlin Worldwide. A Survey of Charitable Giving after September 11th, 2001. Washington, DC: Independent Sector, 2001. 10 p.

Presents the results of a national telephone survey of more than one thousand Americans in October 2001. Among the major findings, it shows that one in seven Americans donated money, blood, or time in the weeks after the attack.

2617. American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, New York, NY. $250,000. Toward work to protect civil liberties in wake of the September 11 attacks. Activities include outreach, litigation and legal analysis focused on rights of Arab-Americans, immigrants, and those detained in connection with attacks.

2618. Aspen Institute, DC. $300,000, 2001. Toward series of seminars for key members of Congress from both parties on issues related to September 11th attacks. Institute also sponsored in-depth congressional conference in January on Islam, terrorism, and the U.S.

2619. Brookings Institution, DC. $150,000. To research broader foreign policy and security implications of terrorist attacks on U.S. policy toward Islamic world, with particular interest in examining causes of Islamic extremism and opposition to U.S. Second project will study how U.S. can protect itself from external and internal attack while imposing fewest costs on American economy and way of life.

2620. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, DC. $130,000, 2001. Toward projects addressing security issues in southern Eurasia, defined as Muslim regions of Russia and states of Caucasus and Central Asia. Activities including bringing visiting scholars from the region to Carnegie staff and examining how experience of nuclear threat reduction cooperation between U.S. and Russian states may be modified to avert potential nuclear crisis in Pakistan.

2621. Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, DC. $250,000, 2001. To study how recent terrorist attacks on America have affected government spending. Center will make policy recommendations about managing national security-related pressures on federal and state budgets on social programs.

2622. Century Foundation, New York, NY. $250,000. To establish task force that will analyze and issue recommendations on mission, structure, and strategy of new Office of Homeland Security. Initiative will focus on long-term strategies for better protecting nation against future attacks while preserving fundamental character of American life.

2623. Chicago Council on Foreign Relations, Chicago, IL. $100,000, 2001. Toward public education and networking related to September 11 attacks. Council also is organizing task force to assess and discuss implications of attacks on Chicago, with special emphasis on including Arab American and other immigrant communities in the activities.

2624. Council on Foreign Relations, New York, NY. $50,000. Toward programs related to September 11 attacks. Activities include task force on America's response to terrorism, roundtable discussions, and relevant publications.

2625. Crossroads Fund, Chicago, IL. $20,000. Toward Critical Response Fund, which makes grants to Chicago-area organizations working to defend civil rights and combat racism and hate crimes. Particular attention is paid to funding organizations that work closely with immigrant groups, especially those serving immigrants whose homelands are currently in the midst of hostilities.

2626. Heartland Alliance for Human Needs and Human Rights, Chicago, IL. $75,000. Toward Midwest Immigrant and Human Rights Center, which has increased services in wake of the terrorist attacks. Center is developing multi-lingual education materials on legal rights, coordinating outreach services for immigrants and refugees in Chicago, conducting Know Your Rights presentations, and monitoring detention practices through visit to jails in Illinois and Wisconsin.

2627. Human Rights Watch, New York, NY. $250,000, 2001. Toward efforts to monitor refugee flows and the effects of hostilities on civilian populations in sensitive areas abroad. Organization will also work in U.S. to monitor possible adverse impacts on Muslim and other ethnic groups.

2628. Institute for War and Peace Reporting, London, England. $130,000, 2001. For project linking journalists and analysts from Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iran, and central Asian states doing independent reporting and analysis.

2629. International Crisis Group (Belgium), Brussels, Belgium. $400,000, 2001. For project titled, Building Sustainable International Defenses Against Terrorism. Work will explore steps needed to preserve stability of states and regions in Central and Southwest Asia.

2630. International Peace Academy, New York, NY. $100,000. For policy research on role of United Nations in addressing terrorism. Because past terrorist acts have often been perceived as domestic in nature, U.N. as an international body has not had to develop mechanisms to combat terrorism and political violence. Project supports workshops on terrorism and ways that U.N. can help sustain broadly supported response by the international community.

2631. International Rescue Committee, New York, NY. $250,000. For activities on behalf of refugees and internationally displaced persons in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Work will include relief, protection, and resettlement services and monitoring of relief efforts.

2632. Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, MD. $15,000. For Watermark Project: Democratization of Water Resource Management in Brazil.

2633. Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Chicago, IL. $65,000, 2001. For work designed to reduce incidence of hate crime and likely landlord and employer discrimination toward people of Middle Eastern ancestry.

2634. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, New York, NY. $100,000. For project to preserve core democratic values in the face of terrorism. Work will focus on detention of non-citizens and use of military tribunals following September 11 attacks.

2635. Lichtenstein Creative Media, New York, NY. $100,000. Toward distribution of Mental Health in Troubled Times, educational kit drawn from The Intimate Mind documentary television programs covering all aspects of mental health relating to September 11 attacks and their aftermath. Another initiative, America's State of Mind, is two-hour town meeting that will be broadcast on public radio stations worldwide.

2636. Lumiere Productions, New York, NY. $50,000. Toward documentary film, Caught in the Crossfire, film about changing lives of Arab-Americans in New York as result of September 11 attacks.

2637. Mental Health Association, National, Alexandria, VA. $150,000. For project to improve community responses to trauma, grief and related mental health needs and coordination of services to meet those needs. Result, Blueprint for Responding to Public Mental Health Needs in Times of Crisis, and companion training program, will provide guidance on crisis response planning, budgetary issues, needs of children, and long-term mental health needs following a disaster.

2638. Monterey Institute of International Studies, Monterey, CA. $100,000, 2001. Toward work to assess risk that weapons of mass destruction, including chemical and biological weapons, might move out of weakened state and into hands of terrorists. Institute also will monitor effectiveness of ongoing U.S. government efforts to reform and rationalize more than 40 federal agencies involved in responding to terrorist incidents, including new Office of Homeland Security.

2639. National Academy of Sciences, DC. $150,000. To accelerate efforts to reduce danger of nuclear weapon use by terrorist organizations. Work specifically addresses aspects of accounting for, monitoring, and protecting nuclear weapons and materials in Russia, as well as stabilization of community of nuclear weapons scientists and technologists in Russia.

2640. National Opinion Research Center, Chicago, IL. $220,000, 2001. Toward Public Response to a National Tragedy, research project to learn how individuals readjust their lives in aftermath of the September 11th attacks and how they react to additional events associated with actions taken against terrorism. Project builds on past surveys of public reaction to previous disasters.

2641. National Public Radio, DC. $400,000, 2001. For expanded news coverage on U.S. campaign against terrorism. Grant supports staff, travel, communications, and equipment incurred in providing comprehensive reporting to meet audience demand for information.

2642. National Security Archive Fund, DC. $200,000, 2001. Toward research, analysis, and public education to protect civil liberties. Project brings together coalition of organizations focusing on issues raised by new legislation designed to combat terrorism.

2643. National Video Resources, New York, NY. $65,000. Toward After 9/11, video collection promoting knowledge, understanding, and tolerance. Documentary films selected for collection will include works on Arab world, Arab-American and East Indian communities in the U.S., and best practices in organizing against intolerance and hatred, and relevant films made by and about young people.

2644. Physicians for Human Rights, Boston, MA. $200,000, 2001. To send three two-person teams to Afghanistan region to monitor and document human rights situation there, with view toward helping movement of food, medicine, and shelter to refugees.

2645. University of London, Cambridge, England. $150,000. For project to draw on European experience in counter terrorist activities and to assess capabilities for coordinated action among European countries and U.S. Helping to bring varying national policies and practices into alignment will significantly contribute to the successful investigation and prosecution of terrorists.

2646. WGBH Educational Foundation, Boston, MA. $500,000, 2001. Toward Frontline's expanded programming in aftermath of September 11th attacks. Documentary series significantly increased number of hours on air to accommodate new, original programs and additional independent productions from around the world.
